Mr. HOAR. Let that go over.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAWYER February 29, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill to increase the pension of John W. January, have examined the same, and report:

The claimant was a member of Company B, Fourteenth Illinois Cavalry. He was pensioned first at the rate of $50 a month, and last at the rate of $72 a month, for loss of both legs. His case is one of peculiar and extraordinary interest. He was captured on Stoneman's raid, in July, 1864, and upon retreat from Macon was taken by six Confederate soldiers to Andersonville, and kept there until the fall of Atlanta made it necessary for the prisoners to be removed to prevent their falling into the hands of the Union forces. He thus tells his own story:

"I was taken to Charleston, S. C., with others, and placed by the enemy under fire of our own soldiers and gunboats; remained here ten days, and was taken to Florence, S. C., where we passed the winter of 1864-'65; and on or about February 15, I was stricken down by an attack of swamp fever, and for three weeks remained in a delirious condition. The fever abated and reason returned. I soon learned from the surgeon, after a hasty examination, that I was a victim of scurvy and gangrene, and was removed to the gangrene hospital. My feet and ankles, 5 inches above the joints, presented a livid, lifeless appearance, and soon the flesh began to slough off, and the surgeon, with a brutal oath, said I would die. But I was determined to live, and begged him to cut off my feet, telling him if he would that I could live. He still refused, and, believing that my life depended on the removal of my feet, I secured an old pocket-knife and cut through the decaying flesh, and severing the tendons, the feet were unjointed, leaving the bones protruding without a covering of flesh for 5 inches.

"At the close of the war I was taken to our lines at Wilmington, N. C., in April, 1865, and when weighed learned that I had been reduced from 165 pounds, my weight when captured, to 45 pounds. Six weeks after I was released, while on a boat en route to New York, the bones of my right limb broke off at the end of the flesh. Six weeks later, while in a hospital on David's Island, those of my left had become necrosed, and broke off similarly. One year after my release I was just able to sit up in bed, and was discharged. Twelve years after my limbs had healed over, and, strange to relate, no amputation was ever performed save the one I performed in prison. There is no record in the world similar to mine. My family consists of my aged parents, my wife, three sons, and three daughters."

This statement is vouched for by persons of the highest character.

Seventy-two dollars a month is the highest pension rate provided by law. In view of the agony, mental and physical, which this man endured while a prisoner, and for many years after, of his physical helplessness, and the inadequacy of his present rating to the support of his family, the committee are of the opinion that this is one of those rare instances in which Congress may extend relief.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Gruber & Co., on October 6, 1866, the loss being without neglect or fault on the part of Osborn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I notice on the twenty-fourth page of the Calendar a bill put down as Senate bill 1033, providing for the purchase of "the Capron collection of Japanese works of art." The bill was reported by the chairman of the Library Committee, and inasmuch as a similar bill has just been passed I call attention to that bill and ask that it may be stricken off the Calendar.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that these two bills state two different amounts according to my recollection.

Mr. VOORHEES. But it is a mistake in calendaring the bill, if I may use the word. There was a first bill and a different amount fixed, and Senate bill 2215 was reported as a substitute or in lieu thereof. The bill just passed was the only bill intended for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1033 will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

The bill (S. 1755) to incorporate the Atlantic and Pacific Ship-Railway Company, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] reported it, and it is a bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. JOHN M'FARLAND.

The bill (S. 2223) to remove the charge of desertion and of having enlisted in the Confederate service from the records of the War Department standing against John McFarland, and to grant him an honorable discharge, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MANDERSON March 5, 1888:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John McFarland, late private Company E, Sixty-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and certain papers accompanying the same, praying that the petitioner might be granted an honorable discharge, and that the charge of desertion or enlistment in the Confederate service might be removed from the records, have given the subject-matter consideration and herewith return the petition and papers with a bill, the passage of which measure your committee recommends.

The facts as fairly established by the affidavits submitted to your committee, and on file with the Adjutant-General, United States Army, appear to be that John McFarland, of Lucas, Richland County, Ohio, enlisted, at the age of about seventeen years, on the 12th of October, 1861, for three years, in Company E, Sixty-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He was at that time a strong, healthy young man and seems to have remained such up to May, 1862, when he was taken sick. He rejoined his command in January, 1863, and was wounded at the battle of Chickamauga in the right leg and left hand on the 19th of September, 1863, where he was likewise taken prisoner by the Confederates, and thereafter confined at Andersonville, Libby, Danville, and Florence. This confinement extended over a period of fourteen months, and until about November 15, 1864, which was over one month after his full term of service had expired.

His sufferings were great and disease had brought him to the verge of frenzy.

If sworn statements of his comrades, Thomas Sexton, Peter Dillon, and Leander S. Marsh, are to be relied upon, McFarland's brain and weakened constitution rendered him a fit subject for an asylum at the time he took the oath to the Confederacy and to enlist on that side, which he evidently resorted to in order to escape death by slow process of starvation, and to gain the Union lines at the first opportunity, which he succeeded in doing four weeks after. Comrade Marsh says of McFarland that "he was hardly able to walk at the time; in fact, he was a moving skeleton." The others corroborate him in this statement. All three comrades say he informed them of his real object, which he put in force. These facts would appear to leave no possible doubt of McFarland's real intent in the premises.

The petitioner had four brothers who served in the Union Army, and the sworn evidence of neighbors, produced to your committee, who had known the McFarland family for years, is to the full effect that its members were loyal and patriotic beyond all doubt or cavil, and the enlistments and service of five brothers of one family would seem to be ample proof to sustain this theory.

Thomas R. Smith, of Newark, Ohio, swears that he was first lieutenant of Company E, Sixty-fourth Ohio Infantry; knew McFarland "ever since he was a child;" that McFarland was "among the best soldiers of my company, and never shirked a duty, and was loyal to the United States Government;" that he saw him after his captivity and return home, and that he "was then a complete wreck, physically and mentally;" that he "did not have control of his mental faculties."

David B. Leiter, of Lucas, Ohio, a comrade of McFarland, swears that he considers his mind "badly diseased and affected, and to such an extent that McFarland has not been capable of conducting or attending any business."

Joseph Fleming, a resident of Ohio, says that ever since McFarland's confinement in Confederate prisons "his mind has been unbalanced and very weak, and he is at times entirely non compos mentis and not responsible for his acts."

All these witnesses knew McFarland before the war, and swear that he was then a strong man mentally and physically.

McFarland's service was as follows: He was with his company and regiment from date of enlistment until the battle of Shiloh, four weeks after which he was stricken with typhoid fever and, partially recovering, he went home on furlough, reporting for duty August 10, 1862, but was sent to Camp Chase, where he suffered a relapse, was sent to hospital, and some six or eight weeks after, upon his urgent solicitation, he was sent with convalescents to Louisville and put on parole guard, General Bragg then threatening that city. He reached his regiment after the battle at Stone River, did duty and drew pay down to the day of his capture at Chickamauga aforesaid.

The House report on the bill for his relief (No. 625) in the Forty-eighth Congress, says:

"During the time he was in the Confederate army he never fired a gun, and constantly watched an opportunity to escape. At the first opportunity he ran into the Federal lines at Egypt Station, on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, and was taken from there to Alton, Ill., and on January 29, 1865, he was released."

Your committee are not unmindful of the fact that great care should be taken in cases of this character lest injustice be done to the living and to the memory of the patriotic dead, but the sworn statements in this case would seem to show that no danger of that character exists here, and to demand that justice should be done not only to McFarland, but to a loyal and patriotic family.

It was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 6, after the word "Navy," to insert "as armorer;" and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-two;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Titus Wilder, who served in the United States Navy as armorer during the war with Mexico in 1846 and 1847, at the rate of $72 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAVIS March 6, 1888:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2064) granting a pension to Titus Wilder, have examined the same, and report:

The record of the Pension Bureau shows that this claimant while in the United States service as armorer's mate upon the United States brig Lawrence lost his left eye while performing duty, and by an accident incident to that duty. He was forging a boat-hook, which slipped from the tongs and fell into a pail of water. The hot steam flew upwards, struck the left eye, destroyed the optic nerve and the sight of the left eye, and affected the right eye until the year 1887, when he became totally blind.

Upon this showing he was granted a pension of $8 per month June 17, 1887, under the act of January 29, 1887, commonly called the Mexican pensions act. By the terms of that statute no greater pension could have been allowed by the bureau.

No reason can be imagined why this man ought not to be pensionable in the same sum that he would be had he been a soldier in the late civil war and had his total blindness resulted from the same causes incident to the performance of duty therein.

Your committee has so held in the case of Martin Kellogg, another veteran of the Mexican war, upon whom the same affliction has fallen.

The passage of the bill is therefore recommended, with the following amendments:

Insert the words "as armorer's mate" after the word "Navy," in line 6.

Strike out the word "fifty," in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventy-two."

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Wirth, late quartermaster-sergeant in Company L, Third New Jersey Cavalry, and pay him at the rate of $30 per month from and after the passage of this act.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS.

The bill (H. R. 2927) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER. There seems to be a minority report in that case, and I suppose the bill will lead to some discussion.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Colorado will not object to the consideration of the bill. The people whom I have the honor to represent are exceedingly anxious and earnest in their desire to have this bill passed at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. TELLER. If there is any member of the minority here, I shall not object.

Mr. HARRIS. Here is one at my elbow.

Mr. TELLER. Then I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 3, line 2, after the word "spans," to strike out the words:

The two middle or channel spans thereof shall not be less than 600 feet in length in the clear, and no span shall be less than 450 feet in length in the clear.

And to insert:

Before approving the plans for said bridge, the Secretary of War shall order three engineer officers from the Engineer Bureau to be detailed to the duty of examining, by actual inspection, the locality where said bridge is to be built, and to report what shall be the length of the main channel span and of the other spans: Provided, That the main channel span shall in no event be less than 700 feet in length, or the other spans less than 600 feet each in length; and if the report of said officers shall be approved by the Secretary of War, the spans of said bridge shall be of the length so required.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I feel that it is my duty to object to the consideration of the bill at this time. The entire membership of the Commerce Committee, from which the bill comes, is absent not only from the Senate but from the city. Several members of that committee feel a great interest in the bill and desire very much to be here when it is passed upon by the Senate. I am entirely willing that the bill shall retain its place on the Calendar, but I ask that it may go over.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course the objection carries the bill over despite anything I can do or say. Inasmuch as the Senator from Texas has objected, and by his objection carries it over, I take occasion now and here to give notice that at the moment, and the first moment, that the morning business of next Monday is concluded, if I can induce the Chair to recognize me, I shall invoke the aid of a majority of this body to enable me to have the bill considered.

Mr. PLATT. I shall have to object to it when that motion is made.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to know why the Senator from Connecticut would object within the morning hour.

Mr. PLATT. Because——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. PLATT. Because, Mr. President, I have discovered that when a contested matter is taken up during the morning hour it invariably runs over past the hour of 2 o'clock, and thereby gets to be the unfinished business of the Senate, having precedence of other unfinished business, when the Senate does not intend to give it that operation.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to say to my friend from Connecticut that the notice I gave was that I should move in the morning hour and ask a majority of the Senate to proceed to consider the bill. I did not say I would ask unanimous consent. The Senator may object, but it will take a majority of this body to make the objection effective.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be announced.

Mr. HALE. It is, if the Senator insists on his objection. The bill only applies to the case of one or two officers of the Navy. At the time an officer enters the Navy, under the rules of the Navy color-blindness is not a personal or physical disqualification. Afterwards during the service it is made so; and therefore he ought to have the benefit of retiring upon that as much as if he had been struck by lightning and thereby made color-blind. This bill is only to relieve such a case as that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will examine it. It can retain its place upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. COCKRELL subsequently said: Order of Business No. 601, being the bill (S. 870) to provide for the retirement of a certain class of officers in the United States Navy, is a little different bill from what I supposed, and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. REAGAN. I object. It is of the same class to which I have objected before.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF PETER LYLE.

The bill (S. 1353) for the relief of the legal representatives of Peter Lyle, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Vincent P. Donnelly, administrator of Peter Lyle, deceased, $3,724.

Mr. PLATT. Let us hear the preamble read.

The Secretary read the preamble, as follows:

Whereas Peter Lyle, deceased, late colonel of the Ninetieth Pennsylvania Volunteers, was mustered out of the service of the United States, in the field in front of Petersburgh, Va., November 26, 1864, for wounds received in battle and which incapacitated him for further duty; and

Whereas a certificate of pension was, on account of his service and wounds received therein, issued to him on July 16, 1879; and

Whereas pending the adjudication of his pension claim he was solely by reason of his injuries wholly unable to labor or in any way earn his maintenance, and was supported from the private means of personal friends, whose advances he engaged and promised to refund out of the arrears of pensions due him when he should receive the same; and

Whereas his unimpeachable personal character was held as sufficient security that such debts of honor would unquestionably be so paid by him; and

Whereas he died on July 17, 1879, after years of great suffering, and after his clear right to pension was fully established and the amount of arrears due him had been definitely ascertained and ordered to be paid to him by the pension agent at Philadelphia; and

Whereas it was indubitably his intention and desire to apply such amount to the discharge of his debts thus incurred and predicated on such allowance, and for the payment of which his honor was pledged; and

Whereas he died intestate, unmarried, and without issue; and

Whereas letters of administration on his estate were duly granted by Vincent P. Donnelly, of Philadelphia, on November 5, 1879, the application for said letters being for the sole and express purpose of disbursing said arrears according to the wish and obligations of Colonel Lyle; and

Whereas the amount of said arrears, in the sum of $3,721, was unquestionably the property of Lyle as soon as his right and title thereto were certified by the Commissioner of Pensions, and would have been paid into his hands but for the accident of his death before the formal vouchers were presented for his signature; and

Whereas the official construction of the law interposes a technical bar to the payment of said money to said administrator; and

Whereas a just and equitable regard is due from the Government to the dying wishes of a brave, accomplished, and deserving officer, who not only gave his life to the service of his country but endured years of physical suffering, added to the years of torture to which his sensibilities were subjected by his enforced obligations incurred to friends for his daily bread and needs, and inability to offer them other security than the justice of his country when it might choose to recognize its obligations; and

Whereas a moral obligation was thereby bequeathed by him to his Government, which it is in equity and good conscience bound to discharge; and

Whereas the fact that the certificate was actually issued, and was practically in the nature of a warrant for payment, renders the equities in this case exceptionally perfect: Therefore, for the purpose of discharging the aforesaid obligations, the incurrence of which to the total of $3,909.86 have been incontestably shown and admitted, so far as the said arrears due at the date of Colonel Lyle's death pro rata may.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is it really necessary to cumber the statute-book with that long argument in the form of a preamble?

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been read now. Let it go in.

Mr. HAWLEY. The printing of it and the looks of it I care for.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES H. REEVE.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to withdraw the motion for one moment, to enable me to secure the passage of a pension bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. If it is only for one bill, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PADDOCK. I called up awhile ago House bill 3898, to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] objected. He has no further objection to the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I withdraw the objection, having examined the case. I have no objection to it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 762, being the bill (H. R. 3898) granting increase of pension to James H. Reeve.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of James H. Mr. CRISP. As the amendment of the Senate to this bill is merely verbal, I ask that it be now considered and concurred in.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 8 of page 4 strike out "Congress" and insert "the Secretary of War."

There being no objection, the amendment was considered and concurred in.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills; which were severally read twice, and referred as follows:

The bill (S. 464) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of the legal representatives of S. W. Marston, late United States agent at Union agency, Indian Territory, for services and expenses—to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 288) for the erection of a public building at Sioux City, Iowa; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be now considered. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have reported unanimously a bill of the same character, differing only in amount.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think we had better have the regular order, so as to reach as soon as possible the appropriation bills, and prepare the way for the consideration of the revenue bill soon to come before the House.

Mr. STRUBLE. I hope my friend from Tennessee will not object. This, I think, will take but a minute. I am prepared to state very briefly the controlling reasons why this bill should pass, and if I can not have time for that, am willing to submit this bill upon the report of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for, in my opinion, the bare facts presented will be sufficient to commend this bill as worthy of immediate consideration.

Mr. MCMILLIN. We are generally told that these bills will take but a minute, but I find that the day, somehow or other, is usually consumed by them.

Mr. STRUBLE. This, I can assure the gentleman, will take but a short time.

Mr. McMILLIN. The appropriation bills are now further behind than ever before; and I think it is time that we should get them before the House and out of the way of the revenue bill soon to come before us.

Mr. STRUBLE. I am satisfied if the gentleman will permit a brief statement of the merits of this case he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no desire to antagonize the gentleman's wish; but I think it is time the public business of the country was having some hearing in this House, and therefore I ask that we proceed with the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SOUTHERN AND WESTERN BOUNDARIES OF KANSAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1633) to extend the southern and western boundaries of the State of Kansas, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is to annex the unorganized portion of certain of the public lands to the State of Kansas for governmental purposes, and should go to the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER. It does not take any portion of a Territory, but applies to the public lands; and it would seem from the title it should go to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is a part of the national domain.

The SPEAKER. Therefore it goes properly to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SPRINGER. But this provides for governmental purposes altogether.

The SPEAKER. It does not create a Territory, nor detach any portion of one Territory and attach it to another, or any part of one Territory and attach it to a State.

Mr. SPRINGER. No; but it includes a part of the public domain and annexes it to a State.

Mr. WEAVER. It is only a matter of government.

The SPEAKER. It simply extends the law, as the Chair understands it, over a part of the public domain.

Mr. HOLMAN. That certainly belongs to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is to extend the boundaries of a State, and to take in a portion of the public land not now in a State of the Union or any organized Territory of the Union.

Mr. WEAVER. It changes the boundaries of a State. That is the idea of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Corresponding matters are all before the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the bill.

The Chair is inclined to think, upon an examination of the bill, that it goes properly to the Committee on the Judiciary. It provides for the enlargement of the State of Kansas by adding to it the unoccupied territory lying south of it, and makes it, of course, upon condition that the State of Kansas accepts it. It makes no disposition of any of the public lands or of any of the territory belonging now to an organized Territory of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the unorganized portions of the public land, and laws relating to them, have always been referred to the Committee on the Territories just as bills relating to Alaska have been so referred; and there is a bill now pending before it for the government of this very land.

The SPEAKER. That may be so; and if this provided for the organization of the Territory, the Chair would have no doubt as to its reference. The gentleman, however, can move its reference to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I make that motion.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 67, noes 24.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on the Territories.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills and joint resolutions of the Senate; which were severally read twice, and referred as follows, namely:

PUBLIC BUILDING, SAN FRANCISCO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1931) to increase the appropriation for the purchase of a site for a building for a post-office, court-house, and other offices at San Francisco, Cal.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, the necessity of the public business at San Francisco requires that this bill should be passed at once; and I hope there will be no objection to its consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have heretofore this morning demanded the regular order for the purpose of getting at the public business.

Mr. MORROW. Let me say to the gentleman that this is a matter of much public necessity. It is a matter of public business interest, relating to affairs of importance in San Francisco, and is an appropriation bill of as much importance as any item in any of the bills pending before Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee to insist upon the demand for the regular order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of L. M. Northcut, certified copies thereof not to be left with the Clerk of the House, as required by Rule XXXIX.

ANTHONY L. WOODSON.

Mr. FINLEY. I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8962) for the relief of Anthony L. Woodson.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FINLEY] had unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill he now calls up. It appeared that the Committee on War Claims had reported a substitute for the original bill, which substitute had not been received from the Printing Office, and, by unanimous consent, the matter went over until this morning. The substitute will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections, as it may be different from the original bill.

The bill (H. R. 8962) for the relief of Anthony L. Woodson, being a substitute for the bill H. R. 4665, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Anthony L. Woodson, of Woodsonville, Ky., the sum of $3,666.20, being the value of quartermaster's stores taken from the said Woodson by the United States forces during the late war, and appropriated to their use; and the further sum of $2,300, being the value of engineer stores taken in the same way for the construction of forts, stockades, etc., at and near Munfordville, Ky.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLAND. The report had better be read.

The SPEAKER. The report was read yesterday morning.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman, in place of calling for the reading of the report, which is of some length, will allow me, I desire to state that I have investigated the matter thoroughly. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on War Claims. I have made myself familiar with the facts. There is no question of loyalty. The committee first reported a sum of thirty-six hundred and odd dollars for quartermaster's stores taken from the claimant.

Since that report was made nine gentlemen of unquestioned reputation have come in and showed that this claimant is not only entitled to the amount the committee allowed him, but that in point of fact he is entitled to $12,000 and upwards.

Mr. BLAND. My object in desiring to have the report read was to ascertain whether any of these items were for destruction of property.

Mr. FINLEY. The facts are these: The claimant owned 400 acres of land on Green River, intersected by the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and turnpike, which were lines of communication for troops. The iron bridge of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad and two ponton bridges rested on claimant's land. It was considered a most important strategic point.

The Federal army took possession of the claimant's farm in 1862. They took his corn for food and his fencing for fuel. His barns, cribs, and stables were burned to prevent their use by the enemy. Five grave-yards were left on the farm, and several battles were fought on the land adjoining it. Besides this the troops in possession cut away 90 acres of timber for the purpose of building forts, etc. For this only one-half is charged of what the proof in the case shows.

The committee have done right in allowing this claim. The claimant is now eighty years of age, and he agrees to take this small amount rather than wait for the probability of getting something for the use of the farm, for which he is entitled to more than this bill gives him. There can be no question at all about the justice of the claim.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FINLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE BLAIR AND LOGAN BILLS.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to make a statement. I was necessarily absent from the session of the House yesterday, as a member of the committee which visited Toledo to attend the funeral of the late Chief-Justice Waite. I therefore could not vote on the bills pensioning the widows of Generals Logan and Blair. If I had been present I would have voted "aye" on both bills.

ACTIONS ON BONDS OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

Mr. CASWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported as a substitute for the bill H. R. 8369 a bill (H. R. 9048) to limit the time in which actions may be brought by the United States upon the bonds of public officers, their sureties or legal representatives; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The original bill, H. R. 8369, was laid on the table.

BRIDGE AT PONCA, NEBR.

Mr. DUNHAM, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2625) authorizing the erection of a bridge across the Missouri River at Ponca, Nebr.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported as a substitute for the bill H. R. 4976 a bill (H. R. 9049) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of Saginaw, Mich.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The original bill, H. R. 4976, was laid on the table.

JOHN H. MARION.

Mr. TAULBEE, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 5327) for the relief of John H. Marion; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER MOFFITT.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6347) for the relief of Alexander Moffitt; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees. The hour for the consideration of bills begins at seventeen minutes to 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take up and pass a bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] insists upon the regular order.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON], who desires to submit some remarks upon the pending Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the bill at present under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. And I wish to state that there is an arrangement between the committee and at least a part of the opposition to this bill that I shall now occupy in opposing this bill not more than ten minutes, and that the rest of the hour be given to members of the committee for the purpose of discussion only. This course is pursued (on my part) for the purpose of indicating to this House that this measure is not to go through by default, and that when the proper time arrives I will ask to be heard at length in opposition to this bill.

This is one of the most important questions which have been presented to Congress, in my judgment, for many years, whether considered from a financial or from a moral standpoint. Twenty-eight years ago the construction of the system of Pacific railroads was regarded as of sufficient importance to be dignified by the two great political parties then in existence with a resolution favoring the project. These companies, in the construction and management of their roads, have had an active existence in this country since 1864; and I undertake to say that every point and period in the history of these organizations—sometimes as construction companies, sometimes as railroad companies, sometimes as credit mobilier companies, but always robbers—has been such as to put this matter before the country in 1888 in such a form and with such consequence that if this Congress shall not see fit to do what ought to be done, no longer with reference to the creation but in this day with reference to the regulation and control of these gigantic corporations, the political parties which this year do not feel it important enough to dignify the matter of the control of these corporations with resolutions in their platforms will not be entitled to and should not receive the confidence of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, the history of these railroad companies is a matter with which this country is entirely familiar. That the career of these companies has been criminal and that they have robbed the Treasury of the United States of hundreds of millions of money is conceded everywhere. By virtue of the position in which they have been placed by their charters granted at the hands of the Government they have absolutely dominated the entire western portion of this country and have extorted in the way of charges and rates above what were legitimate and in violation of specific law, such as they themselves have from time to time suggested, an amount of money more than equal to the amount that has been directly taken from the Treasury.

These companies, and especially the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which is the subject of the bill now under consideration, went on in this career until many years ago there was developed a scandal which absolutely appalled the country and carried into disgraceful oblivion some men who theretofore had been among the illustrious statesmen that had adorned the annals of our history. They went on in this career for many years, but there was not realized in their case what the experience of men has incorporated into a proverb, that "when rogues fall out honest men get their dues." In this case the "rogues fell out," but honest men did not get their dues, for I think it can be demonstrated, notwithstanding the parade which is made here in this House and before the country—I say this with all deference to the gentlemen who represent views opposed to mine—it can be demonstrated that, so far from there being now a new management of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the direction of that road to-day is controlled by the old credit mobilier gang, and the same gang which as a construction company and as a credit mobilier company preyed upon the country in 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873 are to-day preying upon the country in the guise of a reorganized and converted Union Pacific management.

It is susceptible of demonstration that a majority of the men who constitute the present management of the Union Pacific Railroad are either the identical men who were engaged in the great Credit Mobilier scandal, or their sons, or the direct legal representatives of the specific interests that were engaged in those great enterprises.

It can be demonstrated, I believe, that enough money has been taken wrongfully out of the Treasury by the men whose business it was to manage these railroads honestly to have paid the entire debt due the Government, including the first-mortgage bondholders, and to have left a net surplus in the Treasury to the credit of the stockholders. I think it can be demonstrated with reference to the Union Pacific Railroad Company that they not only had, over and above what it cost to construct their road, $142,813 in actual cash from the sale of the first-mortgage bonds and the Government bonds, and stock, land grant, and income bonds, making a net total profit of over $56,907,000, but that this same construction company, this same Credit Mobilier gang, this same combination and interest have received out of the diverted earnings of this railroad between $150,000,000 and $200,000,000; and when we consider the great difference that this management has constantly made between gross receipts and gross earnings, the diversion that has been made in the interest of "pools," the dividends which have been paid to stockholders on stock issued and held fraudulently, and for which the parties have never paid a dollar, the aggregation of these great sums will demonstrate the fact that, under an honest management of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, it would be competent for it with its present earnings under existing law to pay its debt in a comparatively short extension beyond the time already given it.

But I am told, Mr. Speaker, that this company has already been so fortified behind judicial determination that it is beyond the reach of the legislative arm of this Government. I undertake to say that it can be demonstrated by the record, and from the proofs which have been submitted here by a commission authorized by Congress to go forth and gather the evidence with reference to that distinct proposition. It can be demonstrated that, under existing law, this company, in the hands of honest management, can pay its indebtedness within a very reasonable time; and furthermore, that so far from being fortified by judicial decision there is substantially only one question which has been determined, and that is that neither the debt nor the interest is yet due.

This company has committed such wanton violation of law since the passage of the Thurman act, which provides that violation of existing law shall work a forfeiture of all the "rights, privileges, grants, and franchises," as to demand at the hands of the Government a policy that will place this road in the hands of a receiver, when, according to law, under direction of the court an honest management of its affairs can be had. It will be seen that a violation of law working a forfeiture of "rights, grants, privileges, and franchises," will forfeit the right and privilege of this company to have further time for the payment of its debt to the Government, and that the same is now due; but whether this view be conceded or not, such violations of law have occurred as to relieve Congress from any embarrassment in dealing with this matter, growing out of the decision of the United States Supreme Court, which held that no part of the Government debt was due until the last issue of bonds became due.

The difficulty has not been in the law, but in the management. Existing law is sufficient with honest management. The business of the country tributary to this road has grown faster than transportation facilities, and the capacity of the road to-day, while not as great as it would have been could it have prevented, as it tried, the construction of all competing lines, is greater than it was before competing lines were constructed.

This company has forfeited to the last degree the confidence of Congress and the country, and no amount of talk about this being a "practical business question," or indulgence in the line of glittering generalities as to the conception and construction of this great system of roads will obscure the fact that, considered as a practical business question, to be disposed of on business principles, this Congress can not afford to treat further with this combination of men who have been continuous and persistent breakers for twenty-five years of all laws made for their government and control.

Conceding the point and confessing the criminal career of the old company, the friends of this bill insist that since 1884 there has been a new and honest management of the affairs of this company. Unfortunately for this assertion, an examination of the names of the men who compose the board of direction, and who it is safe to presume represent a majority of the stockholders, discloses the fact that a majority of them are the same men, or their immediate representatives in the same interests, who were in control in the days when the greatest transgressions were committed.

Sidney Dillon, F. Gordon Dexter, Elisha Atkins, Ezra H. Baker, and Fred L. Ames are directors in the Union Pacific Railway Company at the present time, and constitute a majority of the executive committee of the board of directors, whose chairman is Charles Francis Adams, jr. The country is familiar with these men, their connection with this company, and their methods of management.

Instead of Mr. Adams purging and purifying this management, the management has managed him as it has all its other affairs, as the history of the business affairs of those men in connection with this road as made by themselves will abundantly prove. The policy of building branch roads out of the earnings of the aided lines, of paying branch lines "constructive mileage," which is another way of misappropriating the earnings of the aided lines, and organizing various commercial corporations to take charge of the business of the entire country tributary to the Union Pacific system, is being plied now as vigorously and on as extended a scale as at any time under the old management, which our friends confess unfit to be further trusted.

President Adams, who stands alone for the new management, is, in connection with the Dillons and the Ameses, president and director, one or both, in from thirty to forty business corporations having for their object the control and domination of the business of the States and Territories dependent for rail transportation on this system of road, and these positions are held by these men by virtue of their positions as the managers of this road, with its Federal charter subject to Congressional control.

So I repeat that forfeiture should be enforced, this whole brood of corruptionists driven from the places of trust they have so long disgraced, and an honest management, under direction of the court, given control and the fact demonstrated that existing law, with slight amendment, is sufficient. And again I say that this question is large enough for a national issue, and that the party that does not this year declare itself in favor of an honest management of these roads will make a great mistake.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads [Mr. OUTHWAITE] in a very clear and explicit manner explained to this House the scope and provisions of the bill reported by the committee. Following him so closely I do not propose to indulge in any review of the history of Pacific railways. Such review would necessitate a recurrence to that time when a railroad to connect our eastern with our western coast was nothing more than a dream thought to be incapable of realization.

I shall not stop to mark the progress of public sentiment and the growth of public faith, which at last, under the pressure of civil war, culminated in legislation authorizing the construction of transcontinental railways and giving to them powerful governmental aid.

I shall not undertake to follow the history of that construction and describe the marvelous engineering skill and audacious enterprise which contribute one of its most brilliant chapters to the story of man's triumph over nature; a skill and an enterprise which made fact of the great Missourian, Benton's, fancy—a train of cars steaming down the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains bearing in transit the silks, the teas, and the spices of the Orient.

I shall not stop to indulge natural indignation and pour out justifiable invective against the grave commercial crimes which stain that history and make infamous the names of men who have been prominent in the public eye.

All these would furnish a field for rhetorical display; but our business to-day is not with rhetoric, but with figures. It is not history, nor theory, nor sentiment with which we have to deal, but business and business interests and business methods.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would not be misunderstood. I do not mean to say that in this discussion we shall not have anything to do with the past. The problems of the present and the future can only successfully be solved in view of the past and within the reach of its shadow. Nor do I mean to assert that the questions presented are purely those of business. On the contrary they are, to a large extent, moral. And as custodians of the national honor as well as of the national treasury, of public morals as well as of the public credit, we have no right to ignore either factor in the problem which presents a twofold aspect.

But I want to call the attention of the House at this point to this fact: That the bill presented deals only with the Union Pacific system, and with the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company. It does not undertake to deal with the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and what I have to say must be listened to with that fact in mind. What the questions may be when the Central Pacific Railroad problem is presented I do not now undertake to say. I do not wish with respect to them to be committed. I want to meet those questions unembarrassed when they come.

The text of what I propose to say is this: That the bill reported to the House deals in a manly and courageous and business-like way with both aspects of the problem presented, both the material aspect and the moral, and deals with them in the best possible way, in the judgment of your committee, that the circumstances surrounding the case admit of.

The significant facts with which we have to deal are these: The Union Pacific Railway Company and the Central Branch Union Pacific Railway Company owe the United States to-day in round numbers $53,000,000.

A MEMBER. Sixty millions of dollars.

Mr. DALZELL. Sixty millions of dollars my colleague suggests; the two together—and that is true if you make no allowance for the sinking fund. By the terms of the legislation which gave rise to that indebtedness, the principal thereof will not mature for almost a decade yet to come. By the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, the interest will not be payable until the principal of the debt matures. Every scheme devised up to this time to secure the payment of that debt at maturity—and it will be $10,000,000 more then than it is now—has utterly and signally failed. It is conceded on all hands that the railroad companies will not be able to pay this debt at maturity, and the reason why they will not be able to pay it then is, because of scandalous transactions on the part of the builders and promoters of these roads whereby the corporations were robbed and the Government security depleted.

Under these circumstances the majority of the commission appointed by the President of the United States to inquire into matters connected with the Pacific railroad companies reports, as a remedy for existing evils between these companies and the Government, a scheme for the extension and ultimate payment of this debt, which scheme also includes a provision for inquiring into the alleged wrongs of wrongdoers. The minority of the commission, upon the other hand, advises a virtual abandonment of the entire debt, a forfeiture of the charters of the companies, which, at least to the extent advised, I undertake as a lawyer to say to any lawyer is a legal impossibility, and the punishment of nobody, save and except only the innocent stockholders.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. And the Government of the United States.

Mr. DALZELL. And the Government of the United States.

Now, just here I want to say that starting upon the examination of this question without prejudice of any kind, my mind a perfect blank with respect to the whole matter, my first impressions were in harmony with the suggestions embodied in the report of the minority of the commission. I still share in his indignation against wrongdoers and their colossal crimes, but my judgment refuses to accede to his method of reasoning as logical or fair, and to his conclusions as either practical or just.

The problem presented is how to collect the Government debt, and at the same time punish those, if any there be, who are deserving of punishment. Bearing this in mind—let me state it again—the problem presented is how to collect the Government debt and to punish wrongdoers, if wrongdoers there be.

I say, bearing this in mind, let me address myself now to the facts a little more in detail.

The indebtedness of the Union Pacific Railway Companies to the United States on the 1st day of November, 1887, was substantially as follows:

Union Pacific Railroad, debt	$27,236,512.00
Kansas Pacific Railway, debt	6,303,000.00
The Union Pacific Railroad, interest accrued but not due	32,039,343.53
Kansas Pacific Railway, interest accrued but not due	7,768,113.09
Total	73,343,968.62
The amount paid on interest account for both companies is	15,440,891.94
Balance of debt	57,903,076.68
If we could consider the amount in the sinking fund a credit, namely	7,343,084.32
We should have a balance standing against the company of	50,171,992.36

The account of the Central Branch Union Pacific, November 1, 1887, is as follows:

Debt owing to United States	$1,600,000.00
Interest accrued but not due	1,965,808.26
Total indebtedness	3,565,808.26
Amount paid on bond and interest account	316,124.12
Balance of obligation	3,249,684.14

If we give a credit to these companies of the amount of the sinking fund, to wit: $7,343,084.32, we have a balance standing against the Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific Railroad Companies of $50,171,992.36. Without going into the details, the figures in respect to the Central Branch Union Pacific Company, estimated upon the same basis, give us an indebtedness of $3,249,684.14. So that this debt, the actual amount thereof on the 1st day of November, 1887, aggregates $53,421,676.50, and if you do not credit to this indebtedness the sinking fund the total amounts to sixty millions of dollars and over. Those who have given this subject attention will understand that under the decisions of the Supreme Court the money in the sinking fund is still the money of these companies, and not of the United States Government.

Now, here is the first significant fact: These companies will owe this Government ten years from now this amount of money plus the accumulation in the mean time. It is conceded that they will not be able to pay, and therefore, the living, crying question for us is, Can the United States collect? Well, that depends upon an answer to the question as to whether or not the lien of the United States is commensurate with the debt; whether it is sufficient upon a forced sale to bring into the Treasury of the United States the amount of the obligations of the companies. With respect to that question, the most important thing to be borne in mind in the discussion and examination of this subject is this: In the case of the United States vs. The Kansas Pacific Railroad Company and the United States vs. The Denver Pacific Railroad Company, both reported in the ninety-ninth of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Government lien was coextensive only with the subsidized portions of the road, or, to use the language of the court:

Extended only to those miles of road in consideration of the construction of which the bonds were issued.

Now, these bonds were issued upon that portion of the road extending from Omaha, a distance of 3.97 miles west of the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific, to a point 5 miles west of Ogden, in the Territory of Utah. That is on the Union Pacific proper. The bonds were issued on the Kansas Pacific only from a point one-half mile west of Kansas City to a point 393.94 miles west of that point.

Now, I ought to emphasize this: The issue of the bonds of the Union Pacific Railroad Company begins at a point nearly 4 miles west of the eastern terminus of that road, and on the Kansas Pacific at a point one-half mile west of the eastern terminus, and as a consequence in both cases the lien of the United States is wholly excluded from the terminals of the roads at Council Bluffs and at Kansas City. And whereas the Kansas Pacific Railroad runs to Denver and thence up to Cheyenne, a distance of over 700 miles, the lien of the United States applies only to 393.94 miles.

I have shown thus far that the lien of the United States extends only to about 1,430 miles of the Union Pacific Railway system. I now call your attention to the fact that the Union Pacific Railway system is very largely in excess of what the lien applies to.

In the first place, we have the main line, 1,038.35 miles. Then there is the line from Kansas City to Denver, 639.2 miles. From Denver to Cheyenne, 106 miles; from Leavenworth to Lawrence, 31.30 miles; or in all 1,815.57 miles of railroad, upon only 1,430 of which does the Government lien attach.

But even then I have not half stated the case. In addition to that there is a very expensive bridge known as the Omaha bridge, 3.97 miles in length. There are in addition terminals at Omaha, terminals at Kansas City, and terminals at Denver. And then on top of all that the Union Pacific Railway system controls 2,761.95 miles of branch roads, from which a very large portion of its income is derived and upon which to a very large extent the prosperity of its future depends.

You will see, therefore, that apart from any question of money—if we should throw out of consideration altogether that question and value so many miles of road at so much, and the terminals at so much, and all that sort of thing, you will see that aside from any question of money the lien is insufficient in character. It is a lien upon a portion of a railroad. It is a lien upon a trunk without a head, without feet, without arms, and without hands. It is a lien which if enforced would invite no bidders to the sale. The property if bought would be shorn of that which is a necessary part of it, and would be absolutely and utterly useless.

But aside from the question of the insufficiency of the character of the lien, inasmuch as we have ascertained the amount of the debt, it is a very easy matter to compare the extensiveness of the lien with the debt, so as to ascertain so far as figures are concerned its money value.

Now, three methods have been suggested for placing a value on the subsidized portions of the Union Pacific Railroad system. It will be readily admitted they can not all be right, more especially since an examination and comparison of these three methods will result in a different conclusion in each case.

It has been suggested that the value of the system might be ascertained from the net earnings, and the minority commissioner, Governor Pattison, reports as the valuation on this basis the sum of $102,000,000. If we should accept that as a fair way of arriving at the value it would then appear that the lien is sufficient as far as mere dollars and cents are concerned, because the amount of the first mortgage and of the Government lien aggregates $86,482,000, and there would be an excess of $15,000,000 of value over the amount of the two liens.

But I need hardly suggest to any thinking man that this is no fair way to arrive at the value of a railroad, because if you apply this as a basis, the value this year might vary millions of dollars from the value next year or the year after, or from what was the value ten years back. Net earnings depend upon economy of management, the business affairs of the country, the amount expended for repairs, and all that sort of thing. So I dismiss that method as not a proper method to be used in arriving at what is a fair and proper arrangement between the United States and its debtor.

Another method suggested is to ascertain the value according to the cost of reproduction. I say that is an unfair method. According to the minority commissioner the cost of the reproduction of the main line of the Union Pacific Railroad would be $27,857,500; of the Kansas Pacific Railroad, 393.94 miles, $11,800,000; or, in other words, the subsidized portion of the system could be reproduced for $39,657,500.

Now, the present value of the Government debt is estimated, under the provisions of this bill at $52,950,000. The first mortgage, which precedes the Government lien, is $33,532,000; so that you have a total of first mortgage and Government debt amounting to $86,482,000; and to meet that debt according to the estimate of value by the cost of reproduction a road worth only $39,657,500, or in other words a road worth over $46.000.000 less than the first mortgage and the Government debt.

But I submit that there is a fair way, and a way which is recognized in business circles and in courts of law, to estimate the actual value of these subsidized portions of the road, and that is by taking into consideration net earnings, original cost, cost of reproduction, increase in value of terminals, increase in value of right-of-way, and then adding to all that the judgment and testimony of men whose business it is and has been to deal with such matters.

Colonel Morgan, an experienced engineer, who was employed by the commission, estimated the value of the entire system, outside, of course, of its investments, at $150,000,000, and it seems to me to be a fair inference from his estimate that the main lines of the Union Pacific and the Kansas Pacific are worth $40,000 a mile. Upon that basis your committee has made to you a report which shows, in fair terms as we think, the present value of the Government lien as compared with the value of the road upon which it rests.

Upon a fair valuation the existing security for the debt of the Union Pacific Railway Company to the United States appears in the following table:

Mileage of subsidized and unsubsidized parts of the Union Pacific Railway Company.

Mileage of Union Pacific Railway Company, branch lines and Omaha bridge excluded (see commissioners' report, p. 4)	1,815.57
Mileage of subsidized line on which the United States has a lien (see commissioners' report, pp. 5, 194, and 195), Omaha bridge excluded	1,430.11
Mileage of unsubsidized line, free from Government lien, Omaha bridge excluded	385.46

Estimated value of security now held by the Government as protection for debt to it.

Present value of debt to the Government as fixed by the bill	$52,950,000
Amount of bonds secured by first mortgages on 1,430.11 miles of subsidized railroad	33,532,000
Total indebtedness secured by first mortgages and Government lien on 1,430.11 miles of subsidized railroad	86,482,000
The subsidized line, at a low valuation, is worth $40,000 per mile (railroad, equipment, buildings, stations, yards, sidings, bridges, culverts, etc., included). The total value is, therefore, 1,430.11 × $40,000=$57,204,400, say	57,200,000
Balance—excess of indebtedness over present security	29,282,000

So that, making even this favorable showing for the value of the subsidized portion of the Union Pacific Railway, the fact is that it lacks by $29,282,000 of the value required to satisfy the first mortgage and the Government lien. If my facts are correct, I have demonstrated, then, with respect to this lien two things: first, that it is insufficient as to character; and, secondly, that it is insufficient in value. I have demonstrated further two significant facts in this connection: first, that the railway companies are unable to pay; and, second, that the United States Government is unable to collect.

We are, then, face to face with this question: Under these circumstances what is the best thing we can do? I answer—and I appeal to every man of affairs in this Chamber if he does not answer—"Get additional security if you can." Can we get additional security? My argument, if it has demonstrated anything thus far, has shown that the largest portion of value belonging to the Union Pacific Railway system is outside of the subsidized portions of the line, and therefore it follows that, unless the unsubsidized portion is subject to liens far in excess of its value, the Government would get additional security by getting a mortgage upon that portion of the system. I therefore call attention now to what it is that the Government would get a mortgage upon if the provisions of this bill became law and were accepted by the companies. The portion of the main line, 385.46 miles, which is unsubsidized, if it is of the value of $40,000 a mile, which we have assumed, is worth $15,400,000. The terminals at Omaha, Ogden, and Kansas City are valued in the commissioners' report at $15,300,000. The Omaha bridge is valued, in the same way, at $2,000,000. The branch lines, 2,761.95 miles, at $25,000 a mile, amount to $69,000,000; and outside investments, according to the report of the commission, represent $20,000,000. Your committee, however, have not taken them at their face value, but only at 50 per cent. of it. Put them in at $10,000,000 and you have as the value of the Union Pacific system, outside of what the Government has a lien upon, $141,400,000.

Now is this encumbered? I answer that the liens prior to any lien the Government would get amount, according to the minority commissioner, to $60,904,350. So that if this bill becomes a law and is accepted by these companies the Government gets additional security for the payment of its debt to the extent of $80,495,650.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Does not the company own, as a corporation, this $80,000,000 worth of property to which the gentleman has referred as not covered by the Government bonds?

Mr. DALZELL. All except the branch lines, the ownership in which is represented by the ownership of the bonds and the stock.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But the company owns those bonds and stock.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then the company owns those branch lines.

Mr. DALZELL. The company does not own all the bonds and stock.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But to the extent to which it owns the bonds and stock, it owns those branch lines. Now, the question I wanted to ask is this: If on foreclosure of the second mortgage it should be found that the property as to which the Government has a claim and on which it has a lien does not satisfy the mortgage, then under the law, as a matter of ordinary justice, would not the Government have recourse by proper action upon the $80,000,000 worth of property which it is proposed to put up as additional security?

Mr. DALZELL. As I understand the law, no.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Why, not?

Mr. DALZELL. I expect to cover that point before I get through with my remarks.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I did not wish to interrupt the course of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. DALZELL. I have already shown that on the present security the deficit amounts to $29,282,000. Therefore, if my figures are right, the benefit to be derived to the Government by getting this additional lien will amount to not only the value of the additional lien secured, but to the amount of deficit made up, $29,282,000, making a gain in security to the Government under the provisions of this bill of over $109,000,000.

Mr. McSHANE. I notice that in the commissioners' report the value of the Omaha bridge is fixed at $2,000,000.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. McSHANE. What is the amount of the first mortgage on that bridge?

Mr. DALZELL. That I can not state; I have not the details here.

Mr. McSHANE. It is $2,500,000.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman will find the figures in the minority commissioner's statement.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is counted in the $60,000,000.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir. I wish it to be understood that having added together what I understand to be the fair value of the unsubsidized portions of the Union Pacific system, I have taken from that ascertained value the aggregate amount of liens as I get them from Commissioner Pattison's report.

Mr. FELTON. Liens prior to the Government lien?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir; prior to any lien the Government would have. The gentleman will find the statement on page 200 of the report of the commission, it is included in the report of Commissioner Pattison.

Mr. FELTON. If there is any lien on the bridge it would be included in that statement.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Now, if I am right in my view of this matter, then the passage of this bill, if accepted, will supply the lacking qualities, so far as security is concerned. It gives the Government a valuable and a sufficient security, and insures the ultimate payment of the debt. As time presses, I omit any minute description of the safeguards which are inserted in this bill to render entirely effective the security that the Government would have. I simply mention them briefly.

In the first place, the provisions of the bill must be accepted; and thereupon we stand on the basis of a contract with a new mortgage, not a statutory mortgage, but a contract mortgage, covering everything that the Union Pacific Railroad Company owns—railroad, terminals, stations, investments, earnings—everything that is capable of being applied to the payment of its debts. Furthermore, although, as I have said, it will be almost ten years before the Government debt accrues, yet, according to the provisions of this bill, payment commences at once, and upon default of any payment for ninety days, the mortgage may be foreclosed.

Furthermore, in order to provide against contingencies, the Government may pay prior liens, and be subrogated to the rights of the holders of such liens. In addition to that, the Government is not bound to pay to these roads a single dollar of the money to become due them for services rendered until payments have been faithfully made by the railroad companies under the terms of the mortgage.

Finally, if these companies do not see fit to accept this act, then the provisions of the Thurman act are extended over the Kansas Pacific Railroad, and payments are to be made which are largely in excess of those called for in the first period of five years under the terms and provisions of this bill.

Now, I take it that, looking at this matter from a business standpoint, only one other question remains for a business man to answer, and that is: Can the debtor comply with the terms of the agreement if it sees fit to accept them? With respect to that question I call attention to the last annual statement, showing the surplus earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad system. The net surplus for 1886 was $3,440,801.38. The first and second payments called for by the bill before the House—the first year's payments, in other words—amount to $1,694,400, leaving a surplus of $1,746,000 to the company for contingent expenses, dividends, or whatever it may see fit to apply it to.

And just at this point I need not argue to the House, to a House composed of men of business, that no scheme for the extension of a debt lasting through a period of fifty years would have any chance of success which would leave the stockholders in a position that during all that time they would receive no return on their investment. Under such circumstances it is not human to expect that the railroad would be run in the interest of its creditors, but rather in the interest of speculators and stock-jobbers.

Now, I said at the outset that there was not only a business question but a moral question involved, and I said also that this bill met both aspects of the question, both the business aspect and the moral; and I will address myself for a few minutes now to that second proposition.

Prior to 1873 the management of the Pacific railroads had been the subject of legislative investigation. At the third session of the Forty-second Congress a committee which is known in the literature of this subject as the Wilson committee made a report. That report reached conclusions of fact and conclusions of law, and I desire to call the attention of the House briefly to what those conclusions were, both of fact and law, as illustrating what interest there is on our part now in any vindication of justice.

According to the findings of fact as embodied in the commissioner's report the Union Pacific Railroad, from Omaha to Ogden, had been constructed under three contracts, known as the Hoxie contract, the Ames contract, and the Davis contract. It was further found during the investigation that assignments had been made of these contracts to a construction company known as the Credit Mobilier of America, whereby the profits derived from these contracts were secured to the promoters of the Union Pacific Railroad Company themselves. The persons who received the profits determined the amount thereof by their own votes.

It was further found that, by virtue of these contracts, there was a profit on the construction of the Union Pacific, on the subsidized portion of the railroad, amounting to $43,900,000. Nearly forty-four millions stolen from the stockholders of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and taken from the security of the United States! Such were the findings of fact; or, to state them in another way, the minority commissioner finds from the same Wilson committee report that, allowing for discount, the railroad was built for less than the proceeds of the first-mortgage bonds and the Government bonds, and the builders took as profit part of the proceeds of those bonds as well as the income bonds, the land-grant bonds, and the stock. The charge upon the books of the company as the cost of the construction is one hundred millions and odd hundred thousands of dollars. And I say to the gentleman who preceded me that he can not feel any more indignation than I feel, or than any honestly constructed man can feel, against the audacious robbery by which the lien of the Government was depleted and these corporations robbed of what belonged to them.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Are not the men who constituted this construction company and who took the thirty-six millions of stock and paid only $218,000 of money, are they not the same men who manage this road to day?

Mr. DALZELL. I understand they are not.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Will you say that they are not?

Mr. DALZELL. I say as the result of a very careful, and I believe conscientious, examination of this affair on my part, that they are not the same men.

Those are the conclusions of fact, and I beg the attention of the House now to what were the conclusions of law, because herein lies the answer, and I think, with all deference to my friend from Iowa [Mr. ANDERSON], an unanswerable answer to his position, that some other scheme than that of an extension ought to be adopted. I will go with him as far as the law will allow me to go in punishment of those deserving punishment, but I say to him that since 1873 no crimes have been committed which will at all compare with the crimes committed prior to 1873, and that against any attempt of the United States Government to punish these crimes there rises up as an impassable barrier the decision of the highest tribunal of this country.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Let me ask the gentleman where in the catalogue he places the issuance of twenty-four millions of stock at the time of the consolidation between the Kansas City branch and the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which issuance of stock was in violation of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873?

Mr. DALZELL. I will show the gentleman, if I have time, that that is covered by the decision in 98th United States.

In 1873, when these crimes were first investigated, when the country was indignant, and when these crimes had been made the subject of thorough and laborious investigation on the part of able men in this House, the conclusions of law were these, and I desire to call your attention to them.

The Wilson committee find, in the first place, that the facts would justify a judgment of forfeiture. But calling to mind the fact that a judgment of forfeiture upon a quo warranto gives nothing in America but the right to administer the assets of the corporation, and does not, as in England, forfeit the property to the Crown, they said as wise men that that would be a useless performance. They find further, as a matter of law, that under the acts of 1862 and 1864, incorporating these companies, the Government had the right to repeal the charters, but like wise men again they said, why kill the corporation simply for the sake of raising up an administrator to administer its assets? So they abandoned that remedy. They found as a further matter of fact that the United States occupy a dual or twofold relation with respect to these corporations, namely, that of sovereign and that of creditor; and they concluded, as wise lawyers, I say, would, that as a creditor the United States had no standing in court.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania be permitted to continue, not to exceed ten minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. If you give us ten minutes also there will be no objection.

Mr. McCREARY. Is that all the time that will be asked?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Ten minutes from now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I say this committee concluded, as a matter of law, that the United States as a creditor had no standing in court; but it did conclude that by reason of the loan of the credit of the United States to these corporations to carry on a great public purpose they therefore—the corporations—became trustees, and the United States, as cestui que trust, had a right to go into court and call for an account.

Now, I beg you to remember that this committee decided as a matter of law that the United States had the one remedy and only one left, which was, to pursue these parties, the corporations, as trustees in a court of equity.

Upon the recommendation of the committee then this House passed the act of 1873, which instructed the Attorney-General to proceed against the Credit Mobilier, and the parties who organized it, and all those who had been robbing the Government and robbing the roads, in any circuit court of the United States. What was the result? I commend this to my friends who oppose the bill for the sake, as they say, of vindicating justice.

The result was that the United States Supreme Court declared, in terms unquestionable and not to be misunderstood, that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, the whole ground on which this bill was based did not exist, and that until the maturity of the debt the United States had no standing in court; that it was the stockholders who had been robbed, that it was the corporation which had been wronged, that the United States had made its contract, had secured its lien, that its debt was not due, and that until it was due and unpaid it had no right to complain. And if my friends upon the other side of the question will point out to me any method or any remedy whereby the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against the Union Pacific Railroad Company in 98th United States can be avoided, I will cheerfully join hands with them in the prosecution of wrongdoers.

Now, with reference to the manner in which this bill meets that phase of the question, I call the attention of the House to section 12 of the bill, which provides that the acceptance of the provisions of this bill shall per se act as a continuing power of attorney to the Attorney-General of the United States to prosecute, either civilly or criminally, any person or persons who in the past have been or in the present are or in the future may be liable by reason of illegally appropriating or misappropriating the assets of this corporation; and not only that, but makes it incumbent upon the Attorney-General—makes it his duty, not his choice—to commence and continue such prosecutions until the money shall be, if possible, collected, to be then applied as a credit on the debts owing by these companies.

The passage of this bill and its acceptance by these companies will bring into the Treasury of the United States, to the relief of the taxpayers of this country, an ultimate sum amounting to $110,000,000—a princely sum, a more than imperial dowry; and I can not be persuaded that the intelligent masses of this country would not visit with condign punishment the members of a Congress who, with such a glittering possibility within their reach, should sacrifice it for a fanciful vindication of public justice at the expense of the public purse.

It brings in $25,000,000 before the debt is due. It condones no wrong. On the contrary, it points out the only feasible and practicable mode of punishing wrong-doers.

Mr. Speaker, I count it amongst the chief glories of the Republic, filled as its history is with great civil and military achievements, that, struggling in the throes of a great rebellion, while it reached out with one hand for union it reached out with the other for empire; that while it contributed with a generosity incapable of measurement men and money to the integrity of the Union and the subversion of rebellion it at the same time, through difficulties manifold, overcame the mountain barriers of nature, and bound with bands of steel our eastern to our western coast. And no sadder commentary, in my judgment, could be written on our lack of advancement than that history should say of us that we were less successful as legislators in time of peace in dealing with problems of business and finance than we were as soldiers on the tented field in solving the great problem of liberty, whereby there was secured for all time, let us hope, the integrity of a continent to a peaceful and prosperous career under the sacred folds of the old flag of our fathers. [Loud applause.]

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

The SPEAKER announced as managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 7316) to divide the Great Sioux reservation into separate smaller reservations, and for other purposes, Mr. PEEL, Mr. HUDD, and Mr. NELSON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 869) for the relief of the sufferers by the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa;

A bill (S. 283) to amend sections 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, setting apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park;

A bill (S. 1697) to grant the right of way through the Indian Territory to the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway Company for the purpose of constructing a railway, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 2550) appropriating $20,000 for the expenses of special and select committees of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. 1956) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Gros Ventre, Piegan, Blood, Blackfeet, and River Crow Indians in Montana, with amendments, requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Messrs. DAWES, STOCKBRIDGE, and DANIEL.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By special order of the House, this day, after the consideration hour, has been set apart for the consideration of bills and measures reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], is entitled to the floor.

EXPENSES OF SENATE INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. BURNES. I desire to call up a bill which has just passed the Senate, appropriating a sum of money for certain Senatorial expenses.

Mr. McCREARY. The Chair has stated that I am entitled to the floor, but as the gentleman from Missouri informs me that the bill he has indicated will only take two or three minutes, and there will be no discussion, and that if any discussion shall arise he will withdraw the bill. I yield to him for that purpose.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, to be immediately available, for the expenses of special and select committees and inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage.

There being no objection the bill was read three times and passed.

Mr. BURNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANSON RUDD.

Mr. McCREARY. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6879) which has been referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6879) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to Anson Rudd, of the State of Colorado, certain real estate in the county of Fremont, in said State.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, without consideration, to make, execute, and deliver all needful instruments conveying and transferring all the right, title, and interests of the United States in and to a certain tract of land situate in the county of Fremont and State of Colorado to Anson Rudd, of Colorado; the tract of land above described being the same tract which Anson Rudd and Harriet Rudd, his wife, conveyed to the United States by general warranty deed, without consideration, dated March 20, 1868, described as follows, to wit: Beginning at the northwest corner of the northeast quarter of section 32, township 18 south, range 70 west; thence east 100 rods; thence south 40 rods; thence west 100 rods; thence north 40 rods, to beginning, containing 25 acres.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of this bill and that it be now considered in the House.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCREARY. This bill embraces only 25 acres. It was introduced by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES]. It seeks simply to convey this land back to the party who owned it and who conveyed it to the Secretary of the Treasury before Colorado was made into a State in order that a penitentiary might be erected thereon. If it is desired the report may be read. This bill simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to convey back this tract of land of 25 acres which were originally conveyed for the erection of a penitentiary and were not used therefor.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCREARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HAYEM & TAYLOR.

Mr. McCREARY. I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6394) for the relief of Hayern & Taylor:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the right, title, claim, and interest of the United States to certain tracts of land in the parish of Iberia, in the State of Louisiana, and described as a tract of land near the town of New Iberia, in said State, and further described in the official maps of the General Land Office of the United States as section 13, township 11 south, range 6 east, late southwest district of Louisiana, containing 221.83 acres, be, and the same is hereby, granted and conveyed to Hayern & Taylor, successors of Hayern, Taylor & De Blanc, their successors, transferees, vendees, and assignees: Provided, That this shall have the effect only of a quit-claim of all the right, title, and interest of the United States therein, not to affect any valid adverse right or title to said land, nor create any liability on the part of the United States.

Mr. McCREARY. A bill similar to this was favorably reported in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, but its consideration was not reached. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GAY], and the land, which only embraces 221.83 acres, is situated in his district.

The bill only asks that the Government execute a quit-claim deed to the land named. And as the surveyor-general and the register of the land office have reported in favor of it, and as the committee is unanimously in favor of it, and as committees in two Congresses have recommended it, I hope the bill will pass.

I desire to have a verbal amendment made by substituting for "Hayern," wherever it occurs, the name "Hayem."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the Government been claiming any title?

Mr. McCREARY. I do not think the Government has ever set up any claim, but it has been thought best to remove any shadow that might possibly rest on this title.

Mr. GAY. The Government has no claim, but there is some ambiguity in the record which it is desired to have corrected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to conform to the bill.

Mr. McCREARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN S. FILLMORE.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 671) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas on the 14th day of December, A. D. 1864, John S. Fillmore, then of Denver, Colo., since deceased, conveyed to the United States of America lots numbered 28 and 29, in block numbered 46, in Denver City (east division), per survey of E. D. Boyd, in the then Territory of Colorado, for the purpose and upon the condition that the same should be occupied as a post-office site, which condition has never been in any part performed: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That all the interest which the United States of America acquired by, through, or under the said deed to the said lots as above described be, and the same is hereby, relinquished to and vested in the persons who by the laws of Colorado would have been entitled thereto at the date of the death of said Fillmore had the said deed never been made, and to their heirs and assigns forever.

Mr. McCREARY. I move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREARY. The report in this case was prepared by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON], and I now yield him so much of my time as he may need to explain the bill to the House.

Mr. WASHINGTON. If gentlemen desire to hear the report I will send it to the Clerk's desk and have it read, but the case is one as to which I apprehend there will be no controversy. In the year 1859 a number of citizens of the United States settled on a portion of the public land at the point now known as the city of Denver. The town-site company, after dividing the land into lots and blocks and laying out streets and alleys, gave a certificate of title to certain of these lots to a man named Parkinson. He held the lots and made improvements thereon, and in 1863 he deeded two of them to Fillmore. Fillmore, for the purpose of inducing the Government to erect a post-office building at that point, made a conditional deed to the United States of two of the lots on condition the post-office should be erected thereon. When, however, the Government had got the property surveyed, a different site in another part of the town was selected for the post-office, and these lots have remained ever since unused and unoccupied, with the conditional title resting in the United States. This bill simply makes a reconveyance to Fillmore and his heirs of such title as he had at the time he made the conditional deed to the Government. That is the whole case, and the committee were unanimous in the recommendation that the bill should be passed.

Mr. McADOO. Does the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommend the passage of this bill?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Yes, sir; it has been submitted to the Land Office and we have their report upon it. The Government has no use for this ground.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY VOLCKER.

Mr. McCREARY. I call up the bill (H. R. 2996) to confirm the title of the heirs or legal representatives of Henry Volcker, deceased, to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico, and I move that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be now considered in the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the heirs, assigns, or legal representatives of Henry Volcker, deceased, be, and they are hereby, confirmed in their title to 640 acres of land situated in the Territory of New Mexico, being the tract of land located by virtue of a certificate numbered 169, of the second class, issued by the board of land commissioners for the county of Bexar and Republic of Texas to Simon Prado, and dated January 5, 1846, and more particularly described in the plat and field-notes accompanying survey numbered 38, in section numbered 15, situated on the table-land or plain between the Rio Grande and the Pecos River, now on file in the office of the commissioner of the general land office of the State of Texas.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon the receipt of the proper plat and survey of the said tract of land, executed by the proper officer, shall issue a patent therefor to the said Henry Volcker: Provided, however, That such patent shall be construed into a relinquishment only of title on the part of the United States, and shall not affect the right of any third person.

Mr. McCREARY. The report in this case was prepared by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THOMAS], and I yield him so much of my time as he may require in connection with this bill.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as this case can be more easily and briefly explained orally than by reading the report, I will, with the permission of the House, make a brief statement. By the laws of the Republic of Texas the head-right certificates for 640 acres of land were authorized to be issued to immigrants who had resided in the Territory a certain length of time, and those rights were confirmed by the State of Texas after it was admitted into the Union. All of these claims within the boundaries of the State have been confirmed as to their title, so far as to enter a patent and make the title perfect. In the case in question a certificate of the kind I have described was issued and the land located within the boundaries of the Republic of Texas; but after the State came into the Union, its boundaries extending to the Rio Grande, the United States purchased a large additional tract of land, for which it paid about $10,000,000, and it happened that this 640 acres was included in the tract purchased by the United States.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the gentleman mean the Gadsden purchase?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. The Gadsden purchase. Of course, the State of Texas can not comply with its contract to issue a patent for this 640 acres, the tract being beyond its jurisdiction. It seems to me there is no equitable or legal right in the United States to claim this land, it having been actually given to this man under the laws of Texas, both as a republic and as a State, and he being in possession of the land and occupying it at the time the territory was sold to the United States. This bill simply provides that the United States shall relinquish what right it may have, in form, to this 640 acres of land, and does not interfere in any way with any conflicting rights that may have arisen between individuals or between any parties whatever except this claimant and the United States.

Mr. PAYSON. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the opinion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office has been taken with reference to the propriety of this proposed legislation?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I am not aware that his opinion has been asked at this session of Congress, but I do know that it was asked in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. PAYSON. And did his opinion favor it?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. It was favorable. The Committee on Private Land Claims in the Forty-ninth Congress reported the bill favorably, as it has been reported in this Congress.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURT FOR PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. McCREARY. I call up for present consideration House bill No. 7643.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill to establish a United States land court, and to provide for a judicial investigation and settlement of private land claims in the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and in the State of Colorado.

Mr. PAYSON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McCREARY. I am directed by the committee to send up some amendments to this bill which I think will meet the difficulty upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] proposes to raise a point of order.

Mr. PAYSON. Reserving whatever rights I may have, I wish to say this: There are several sections of this bill to which I think a point of order would be properly sustained. I am opposed to them, and I desire not to waive any right I may have to make a point of order at the proper time.

Mr. McCREARY. I understand that.

Mr. PAYSON. Assuming that any right I may have will be reserved, I have no objection to yielding in order to hear the amendments read.

Mr. McCREARY. That is understood.

Mr. HOLMAN. I observe that this bill involves an appropriation of money.

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the gentleman from Kentucky, as I understand, desires to have it considered in the House.

Mr. McCREARY. The bill does involve the creation of an office, but does not appropriate any money.

Mr. HOLMAN. Still it is subject under the rules to a point of order which would send it to the Committee of the Whole. But if the gentleman from Kentucky desires to have the bill considered in the House, subject to the same rules as in Committee of the Whole, I shall not be inclined to object.

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the House Calendar, and unless a point of order is made it will of course remain in the House. The gentleman from Kentucky sends up certain amendments to be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out section 3, section 4, and section 5.
Amend line 4, section 10, by inserting, after the word "Colorado," the words "notice of the passage of this act."
Amend section 13, line 22, by substituting the word "and" for the word "or."
Amend section 18, line 3, by inserting, after the word "lands," the following words: "Claimed in either of said Territories or States under or by virtue of any right, title, or authority derived from Spain or Mexico, or under the laws, usages, and customs thereof."

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, to strike out the three sections named, meets the point I had intended to make; hence I have nothing further to say.

Mr. McCREARY. I move to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYSON. How is this bill to be considered? Is it not in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The bill is on the House Calendar; and unless some other arrangement be made it will be considered under the rules usually prevailing in the House, subject, of course, to the calling of the previous question at any time.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to make a point of order as to the position of the bill on the Calendar. The provisions of the bill necessitate an expenditure of about $30,000 of the public money annually. Hence, it seems to me that the bill, under the rules, is improperly on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided, a moment ago, that if the point were raised the bill must be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] suggested that point, and then declined to insist upon it. Thereupon——

Mr. PAYSON. I make that point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not press the point of order because I supposed the gentleman from Kentucky intended to have the bill considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear that.

Mr. PAYSON. I do not desire any limitation upon the debate on the bill; but with the understanding that it is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, I will not press the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] states that he will not insist on the point of order if it be understood that the bill will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McCREARY. What does the gentleman mean by "as in Committee of the Whole?"

Mr. PAYSON. That it shall be considered without any limitation on the debate—that it be debated as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state what would be the effect of an order that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. General debate would proceed subject, in the Committee of the Whole tc the right of the House by an order to close the debate, which right exists of course in the Committee of the Whole. The bill would then, after the closing of general debate, be considered by sections under the five-minute rule. In the Forty-eighth Congress the Chair submitted to the House the question whether or not, when a bill was being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, the House would close debate by the previous question or by an order; and the House decided that, by analogy to proceedings in Committee of the Whole, it would close it by an order. Since that time such has been the practice.

Mr. McCREARY. The previous question would be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order, but would operate only on the amendment upon which it was moved, or upon that and a pending amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. I wish the gentleman from Kentucky to understand that I am not making any captious opposition, but merely insisting that we shall have the ordinary privileges of debate which under the rules are allowed in Committee of the Whole on bills of this character.

Mr. HOLMAN. There should be some understanding about the length to which this debate should be allowed to run. Of course, gentlemen representing the Territories and the State interested in the provisions of the bill will be heard, but it would be well, in my judgment, to fix some limit to the debate before it is commenced. Even if the bill is to be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, we ought to fix the time which is to be allowed in the debate. Is an hour and a half sufficient? I would suggest two hours. Is there objection to that?

Mr. PAYSON. I think the debate should proceed in the regular way, and therefore I am inclined to insist on my point of order that the bill must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McCREARY. It will be in order of course to discuss the bill under the five-minute rule, and in view of that fact I do not see why the general debate should not be closed in a shorter period than has been suggested.

Mr. PAYSON. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The point being made, the bill must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McCREARY. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

Mr. McCREARY. I move that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, the object of the bill under consideration is to provide for a judicial investigation and settlement of private land claims in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona and in the State of Colorado, arising by virtue of any right, title, or authority derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments which the Government of the United States should respect under the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, proclaimed July 4, 1848, or the treaty known as the Gadsden treaty with Mexico, concluded December 30, 1853, or under the laws, usages, or customs of Spain or Mexico concerning the disposal of lands.

The Committee on Private Land Claims, after careful consideration, agreed unanimously to report this bill with a favorable recommendation. It is believed that if it is passed and becomes a law private land claims in the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and in the State of Colorado, so long a source of vexation and harassment to the people, so long retarding progress and immigration and improvement, will be speedily settled.

The importance of this measure is shown by the number of acres of land the title to which is to be settled under its provisions. The Commissioner of the General Land Office states that there are now pending in Congress and awaiting confirmation reports of surveyors-general upon private land claims as follows:

	Acres.
In New Mexico, 107 claims, covering	8,704,785
In Arizona, 15 claims, covering	414,833
In Colorado, claims covering	229,814
Making a total of	9,349,432

The number of acres for which no claim has been filed and the number of acres for which claims have been filed but which are undecided are not included in these figures.

It is, however, estimated that the total number of acres claimed under private land grants and which are unsettled, in New Mexico, cover about 10,000,000 acres; in Arizona, about 6,000,000 acres; and in Colorado, about 1,500,000 acres, making altogether the enormous territory of 17,500,000 acres, being more than the combined area of the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Hampshire.

The bill proposes to speedily settle the title to this immense extent of territory.

The demand for a speedy settlement of these land claims comes from the people and from their Representatives in Congress, and from their most prominent officials.

Justice to the people of these sections where development and progress have been retarded for many years; justice to the Government of the United States, which is honorably bound by solemn treaty obligations, and proper respect for the progress of this age and the movement westward "of the Star of Empire," demand prompt and efficient legislation. Secretaries of the Interior and Commissioners of the General Land Office have repeatedly urged a speedy settlement of these land titles.

Mr. PAYSON. Will it interrupt the gentleman to ask a question?

Mr. McCREARY. No, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. Do we understand the gentleman to give us to infer by that statement that the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office approves this present bill, or that any Secretary of the Interior or any Commissioner of the General Land Officer has ever approved a scheme like this?

Mr. McCREARY. This bill has not been referred to the Secretary of the Interior, because, as I understand it, the House of Representatives is competent to consider and adopt such measures as it thinks proper in connection with these matters, and I have not consulted the Secretary of the Interior about this bill.

Mr. PAYSON. But the gentleman stated, as I understood him—without desiring to interrupt his remarks—that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office had asked a speedy adjustment of these claims, and I thought the inference made on the House was that this had been the request of the present officials of the Department.

Mr. McCREARY. What I said was that the Commissioners of the General Land Office and the Secretaries of the Interior had urged a speedy settlement of the private land claims, and in support of that I will read some extracts.

The Secretary of the Interior said, in his annual report of 1880:

> Its operation has been a failure, amounting to denial of justice both to the claimants and to the United States.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report for the year 1886, said:

> A speedy and effective plan for the disposal of land claims in New Mexico and Arizona is demanded by the exigencies of the case.

The Commissioner of the Land Office, in his report for 1876, said:

> While these private land claims remain in their present unsettled condition it will continue to retard emigration to and settlement in said Territories, and until the titles thereto are ascertained and the land segregated from the public domain it will be impossible to determine which is public land, subject to appropriation and settlement under the public-land laws and which is not.

And the surveyor-general of New Mexico, in his last annual report, declares:

> What is wanted before all things is a speedy settlement of the titles so long left in painful uncertainty.

The faith of our Government is solemnly pledged by treaty stipulations to the ascertainment and settlement of these claims. The eighth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo provides that—

> Mexicans now established in Territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they possess in said Territories, or disposing thereof and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.
> Those who shall prefer to remain in the said Territories may either retain the title and rights of Mexican citizens, or acquire those of citizens of the United States. But they shall be under the obligation to make their election within one year from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; and those who shall remain in said Territories after the expiration of that year, without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans, shall be considered to have elected to become citizens of the United States. In the said Territories property of every kind now belonging to Mexicans not established there shall be inviolably respected. The present owners, the heirs of these, and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract shall enjoy with respect to it guarantics equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States.

By the subsequent treaty with Mexico, concluded in 1853, known as the Gadsden treaty, the provisions of this article were made to apply to the territory then ceded to the United States by the Mexican Republic and to all the rights of persons and property, both civil and ecclesiastical, within the same as fully and as effectually as if the said article was again set forth.

In recognition of these treaty obligations, and to carry out in good faith their stipulations, Congress passed an act, approved July 22, 1854, the title of which is "An act to establish the office of surveyor-general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes."

Section 8 of that act is as follows:

> And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general, under such instructions as may be given by the Secretary of the Interior, to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico, and for this purpose may issue notices, summon witnesses, administer oaths, and do and perform all other necessary acts in the premises. He shall make a full report on all such claims as originated before the cession of the territory to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, of 1848, denoting the various grades of title, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each of the same, under the laws, usages, and customs of the country before its cession to the United States; and shall also make a report in regard to all pueblos existing in the Territory, showing the extent and locality of each, stating the number of inhabitants in the said pueblos respectively, and the nature of their titles to the land. Such report to be made according to the form which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, which report shall be laid before Congress for such action thereon as may be deemed just and proper, with a view to confirm bona fide grants and give full effect to the treaty of 1848 between the United States and Mexico; and until the final action of Congress on such claims all lands covered thereby shall be reserved from sale or other disposal by the Government, and shall not be subject to the donations granted by the previous provisions of this act.

The provisions of this section were extended to Colorado by the act of February, 1861, and to Arizona by the act of July 15, 1870. This remedy has proved unsatisfactory and inadequate, and almost valueless to claimants. The report of the Land Commissioner of 1880 declares that after a lapse of nearly thirty years more than one thousand claims have been filed with the surveyors-general, of which less than one hundred and fifty have been reported to Congress, and of the number so reported Congress has finally acted on but seventy-one. I will file at the close of my remarks the written statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office showing a list of confirmed private land claims in New Mexico and Colorado, and also a list of one hundred and twenty-three private land claims in New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado now pending in Congress awaiting confirmation, and the papers of which claims are before the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. The remarkable fact appears in the written statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that from 1860 to 1869 only five private land claims were confirmed, and from 1869 to 1879 only three were confirmed, and from 1879 to the present time, a period of nine years, not a single land claim has been confirmed.

Hon. W. A. J. Sparks, in his report of 1886, appropriately said:

> The very loose terms of the act of July 22, 1854, enable great bodies of land to be held in indefinite reservation upon the mere assertion of some claim that perhaps has no foundation, or if valid at all is valid only for a fraction of the claimed area. It is the public demand that whatever valid claims may exist to any such lands should be finally determined and the overplus of the reserved lands opened to settlement and entry.

Congress has been far more generous and attentive to private land claimants on all other lands acquired by purchase or treaty than to the claimants residing in New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado. In 1803, under the Democratic administration of Mr. Jefferson, we acquired from France the Louisiana territory, about 757,000,000 acres—larger in extent than all the thirteen original States, embracing all of Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Iowa, Nebraska, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, with parts of Kansas, Minnesota, Colorado, Wyoming, and the Indian Territory.

In the same year Congress provided for two boards of commissioners to adjust titles in Mississippi Territory. Encouraged by the celerity of the appointments made, Congress, in 1807, provided for boards of commissioners to ascertain and settle claims in the whole of the Louisiana purchase.

Florida, containing 38,000,000 of acres, was acquired by the United States from Spain during the Democratic administration of Mr. Monroe by the treaty of February 22, 1819, and was surrendered to the United States July 17, 1821. Congress passed an act May 8, 1822, in less than one year, providing for a board of commissioners, and vested them with confirmatory powers of land claims.

In 1848, under the Democratic administration of Mr. Polk, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, we acquired from Mexico 334,500,000 acres of land, being now California, Nevada, and large parts of Arizona, Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico. In 1853, under the Democratic administration of Mr. Pierce, we acquired by the Gadsden treaty about 30,000,000 acres of land from Mexico, being parts of Arizona and New Mexico. The act of Congress passed in 1854 applies to such parts of this land as are embraced in New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado. Land claims in California were settled under the act of 1851.

Although forty years have elapsed since the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was proclaimed, but little progress has been made in the settlement of land claims in the said Territories and States.

Many plans have been presented and a number of bills have been introduced for the purpose of speedily and justly settling these private land claims. A land commission has been suggested, but there are serious objections to this plan.

The act of Congress of 1851 providing such a commission for California was not a success, and Mr. Lamar, while Secretary of the Interior, in his annual report declared that—

> To the suggestion of a special commission, to sit at convenient times and places, to hear and dispose of these claims, equally vigorous objections are presented, and it is urged that the experience obtained from the California commission is of such a character as to make a tribunal of that kind least advantageous of all the methods proposed.

Several Commissioners of the General Land Office and several surveyors-general who have had good opportunities on account of their official duties to ascertain the most efficient means for the settlement of these claims have earnestly opposed that plan.

Speedy settlement of titles so long left in perplexing uncertainty is indispensably necessary, and the proposed legislation authorizing the appointment of a board of commissioners, with the right of appeal from their decision to the district courts of the Territories or States, and then to the Supreme Court of the United States, would, as these courts are already overburdened with work and several years behind, delay the settlement of land claims for many years. The present able and efficient governor (Ross) of New Mexico said, in his address before the Committee on Private Land Claims:

> To require settlement by a commission, as in the case of California, would be impracticable, as the lapse of time in this case has led to interminable complications and confusion, aggravated by perjury, fraud, and every conceivable form of ingenious rascality, to that extent that their circumvention is impossible except through rigid judicial investigation.
> What we especially desire as machinery for the adjudication of these matters is a separate, independent judiciary, for the time-being disconnected in every way from the current courts of justice, a tribunal that shall devote its entire time and effort to this single purpose, and be in its fullest sense a court of equity, authorized and competent to take entire jurisdiction of all the complicated phases of this most extraordinary condition of affairs. No other tribunal can successfully grapple with it. Our courts as now constituted are already overwhelmed with the burden of litigation that is constantly coming before them in increasing volume. To add to their present duties the settlement of these titles would be to decree its indefinite postponement. The man is not born who would see the end.

There are also grave legal questions, involving the authority of commissioners to exercise judicial power, which increase the objections to this mode of settlement.

Another proposition is the reference of these claims for adjudication to the district courts of the respective Territories and States under whose jurisdiction the lands might be situated, with the right of either party to appeal from their decisions within six months to the supreme court of the Territory, and from the decision of that court to the Supreme Court of the United States within one year.

There are many objections to this plan, only one of which I will present. The dockets of the district judges of New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado are already crowded with legitimate and indispensable business, and they could not undertake this additional work without almost totally abandoning their regular and necessary duties; and if this double duty should be imposed on them, and appeals from their decisions to the Supreme Court of the United States should be taken, as would certainly be done, there would be such interminable delav as would be almost a denial of justice.

A tribunal clothed with all the functions of a court, and authorized to judicially investigate and settle private land claims, it is now generally conceded, will furnish the relief desired. The bill under consideration establishes a United States land court, to consist of a chief-justice and two associate justices, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the Secretary of the Interior is required to provide suitable rooms in the city of Washington for the occupation and use of said court

The court is divided into three departments, to be known as departments No. 1, 2, and 3 of the United States land court, to each of which departments one of said justices shall be assigned by the chief-justice, and such departments may sit simultaneously, and the justice of each department shall have full power to examine, hear, and determine any cause coming before him in said department, and from time to time the justices are required to sit in banc for the determination of such causes as may be brought before them, and a competent attorney to represent the United States is authorized to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

In every case where it does not appear by evidence satisfactory to the court that the value of the property involved, with improvements thereon, exceeds the sum of $2,000, the decision of the justice rendered in department shall be final, and in every case where the value of the property involved, with improvements thereon, is shown to exceed the sum of $2,000, either party, not satisfied with the decision rendered, shall have the right of appeal to the court in banc, and in every case where it does not appear, by evidence satisfactory to the court, that the value of the property involved, with improvements thereon, exceeds the sum of $5,000, the decision of the court in banc shall be final, and where the value of the property involved, with the improvements thereon, exceeds the sum of $5,000, either party, not satisfied with the decision rendered, shall have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner and upon the same conditions that is provided by law for the taking of appeals from decisions of the district courts of the United States.

It is also provided that the court, by one or more of its members, in the discretion of the chief-justice thereof, shall be in session at least six months in each and every year, at Santa Fé, in the Territory of New Mexico; at Tucson, in the Territory of Arizona, and at Denver, in the State of Colorado, until the business of said court is completed. The duration of the terms of said court at the respective places named shall be regulated by the chief-justice.

Many claims will have to be decided on the papers now in the General Land Office of the Interior Department at Washington, because in many instances the witnesses are dead or have disappeared.

Yet there are many cases where the witnesses of both the claimant and the Government would be hazarded by a tribunal sitting elsewhere than in the vicinity of the land, because many of these claims are not based on written titles, and because also of the perfectness with which fabricated grants are often supported by papers prepared for the occasion. One or more of the judges, therefore, in the discretion of the chief-justice, shall hold court in the capital of each of the Territories and States every year.

The surveyors-general of New Mexico and Arizona strenuously urge that Congress should pass a statute of limitation, fixing a time within which new claims shall be filed or thereafter be forever barred, and Commissioners of the General Land Office and Secretaries of the Interior have for years recommended that such a limitation be fixed.

The bill therefore provides that each and every person, corporation, or association claiming lands in either of said Territories or State under or by virtue of any right, title, or authority derived from the Spanish or Mexican governments, which right, title, or authority it is claimed the United States is bound to respect under the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, or the treaty known as the Gadsden treaty, with the Government of Mexico, or under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico, in the disposal of lands, shall, within two years from the date of the approval of this act, present to the said court, or any justice thereof, a petition setting up the facts upon which claimant relies in support of said claim, or be forever barred, and all lands the claims to which shall be finally rejected by the said court or by the Supreme Court, and all lands claimed in either of said Territories or State under or by virtue of any right, title, or authority derived from Spain or Mexico, or under the laws, usages, and customs thereof, to which no claim is presented to the said court in two years from the approval of this act shall be deemed, held, and considered to be a part of the public domain of the United States.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office in his report of 1886 states that there are thousands of small land-holdings by the native inhabitants of New Mexico and Arizona who have no claim of special grant and are without record evidence or written title, but claim their possessions solely by right of occupancy and prescription under the laws and usages of Spain and Mexico. In many instances these ancestral homes have been handed down from sire to son and from generation to generation for more than a hundred years. Most of these occupants are poor but honest people, whose title the Spanish and Mexican governments would have respected, and whose title by occupancy according, to the usages and customs of Spain and Mexico, is recognized by the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

Justice and fairness therefore required that there should be a provision in the bill that where any claimant shall produce evidence to the satisfaction of said court of the continuous occupany and possession by himself, his ancestors, or grantors for forty years next preceding the date of the approval of this act of a tract of land in said Territories or State, not exceeding 160 acres in extent, no further evidence of title or ownership shall be necessary from such claimant, but he shall be entitled to confirmation of his title to such land.

Grants of agricultural land by Spain and Mexico did not convey to the grantees the minerals found therein, which consequently passed to the United States under our treaty with Mexico in 1848.

The policy of the Government should be defined and settled on this subject, and the bill provides:

That no allowance or confirmation of any claim shall confer any right or title to any gold, silver, or quicksilver mines, or minerals of the same, unless the grant claimed affected the donation or sale of such mines or minerals to the grantee, or unless such grantee has become otherwise entitled thereto, in law or in equity, but all such mines or minerals shall remain the property of the United States, with the right of working the same and authorizing the same to be worked, and every confirmation made and patent issued under this act shall be made and issued subject to the rights of the United States to authorize the lands included in such confirmation and patent to be entered upon by its citizens for the purpose of cession for locating and working gold, silver, and quicksilver mines, or minerals of the same, that may be found therein, and to pass such laws as shall procure such rights and make the same effectual, which shall be stated in any patents issued under this act.

Governor Ross, the present governor of New Mexico, says:

While it is undeniable that a large proportion of the number of Spanish and Mexican grants now on file and seeking confirmation are honest and valid in their inception, it is indisputable that in a preponderance of the acreage embraced in many of the larger grants the claim is absolutely fictitious and founded in fraud.

This condition of things has existed now more than thirty years, and instead of the situation being relieved by what has been done ostensibly to that end, it has year by year been growing worse, until several millions of acres of as good land as the sun shines upon is absolutely sealed up against settlement and development.

To illustrate the methods that have produced these complications—near the city of Santa Fé is a grant known as the Cornfield grant. Some one hundred and forty years ago a citizen of the locality petitioned the governor of the province for the concession of a piece of land large enough to keep a stipulated number of domestic animals and to raise a little corn for the support of his family. The concession was granted, and it is to be supposed that the petitioner was duly put in possession of his grant. In the mutations of time the petitioner and his family passed away and the land lapsed into a state of nature, and all evidence of the concession was apparently lost. But a few years ago the evidence of the concession, bearing the signature of the governor of a hundred and forty years ago, singularly came to light, accompanied by the application of the holder and claimant, for the approval of the grant by the then surveyor-general, embracing some 240,000 acres of land. The application was approved for 103,000 acres and forwarded to the then Secretary of the Interior for approval by Congress. Not long since this grant was surveyed by order of the present surveyor-general, in careful accordance with the natural objects specified in the concession, as near as it was possible to fix them, and found to contain a fraction less than 130 acres.

Another illustration was in what was known as the Uña de Gato grant, in one of the northern counties of the Territory. This concession, purported to have been made by the governor of New Mexico in 1839, and embraced some 300,000 acres; it was most carefully drawn and apparently perfect in every particular until it was discovered, after it had passed the approval of the then surveyor-general and been sent to Congress for confirmation, that the concession had been prepared long after the governor purporting to have executed it had gone out of office, and that it was, therefore, absolutely fictitious and fraudulent.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report for 1887, says there is a well-organized conspiracy on foot to endeavor to secure a reservation of five millions of acres of land in the garden district of Arizona, which is based on a manufactured claim that is wholly fraudulent. Thus great areas of land, aggregating millions of acres, are sought to be filched from the public domain and from the people.

Hon. George W. Julian, surveyor-general of New Mexico, in his report for 1887, said of the Territory of New Mexico:

> Of the patented and unpatented lands I have referred to, aggregating 8,694,965 acres, I think it will be safe to estimate that at least one-half, namely, 4,337,482 acres, have been illegally devoted to private uses under invalid grants or unauthorized surveys. If to this sum I add the estimate before mentioned of about 4,000,000 acres unlawfully appropriated in cases pending before Congress, an approximate estimate will be reached covering from 8,000,000 to 9,000,000 acres of the public domain, which are now, and for many years past have been, in the grasp of men who have used and enjoyed the land for their own emolument, and whose earnest prayer is to be let alone in the possession of their ill-gotten gains.
> Equally noteworthy is the power of these claimants over the general fortunes of this Territory. They have brooded over it like a pestilence. For a quarter of a century prior to the inauguration of President Cleveland their ascendency over Federal and Territorial officials was practically unhindered.

It has been said, "To rob a man of his home, and take from him the shelter and support of his family, is a crime second only to murder." To filch from the nation its public domain, which should be held for actual settlers, is not only a crime against the poor who need homes, but it is an assault upon justice and law which should not be tolerated.

It is of the highest importance that our Government should ascertain without delay what lands belong to it, and it is in accordance with justice and our treaty obligations that we protect bona fide holders in their rights. Already many millions of acres of our public lands, nearly equal in extent to the thirteen original States, have been given away to railroad corporations, much of it rich as the valleys of the Nile or the Euphrates, and our once almost limitless public domain has been greatly reduced.

New and dangerous schemers are seeking, under the guise of private land claims, to still further rob the Government of land acquired by its treasure and by the blood and bravery of its sons.

Unless we call a halt, unless we say to the land-grabber and the homestead-wrecker, "Thus far thou shalt go, and no further; here shall thy proud course be staid," it will not be long before, in this great Republic, stretching from ocean to ocean and from the northern lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and comprising over 4,000,000 square miles, there will no longer be any public land to be occupied as homes for honest settlers or to be coveted by land pirates and speculators as the basis of fortunes almost as fabulous and expanding as that of Monte Cristo.

New Mexico is approaching statehood. Legislation is now pending for her admission into the Union. Arizona will follow soon. Colorado is already a growing giant in the grand confederation of States. Over a thousand miles of railroad are projected in these Territories and in this State. From the deepest depth of the earth to the sky they seem to be blessed with attractions. Inexhaustible mines of gold and silver and copper demand development and defy competition. Illimitable coal deposits sufficient to supply the needs of the continent, agricultural lands equal in productiveness to the best in the West, and a climate as healthful and salubrious as any in the world invite the farmer, the laborer, the professional man, the miner, the merchant, and the manufacturer to come and locate and be happy and prosperous. The only shadow and the only blight in these marvelous attractions are the clouded titles of unsettled land claims, which are a perpetual menace to holders and a continued alarm to immigrants.

For over thirty years, or since the act of 1854 proved a failure and a burden, people in that part of our country have begged and their legislatures have memorialized Congress for relief.

Under existing law Congress alone has jurisdiction to settle private land claims, but it has been years since a bill has passed the House of Representatives confirming and settling a land claim in New Mexico, Arizona, or Colorado. We owe it to the people and our treaty obligations require that they should have a fair tribunal for the speedy adjustment of private land claims.

The bill under consideration provides a fair, comprehensive, and speedy plan for the settlement of these claims. The court which is created only lasts for four years, and it is believed in that time the relief so earnestly demanded will be granted.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1888.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Private Land Claims, in formulating the bill now under consideration, did not, I think, properly draw the distinction between the conditions existing in these several Territories. The Territory of Arizona, for instance, does not need this bill, and if it should unfortunately pass it will only prove another engine of oppression to those brave men who have borne all of hardships that man can bear, who have labored in and out of season in an honest effort to establish homes for themselves in a land which only a few short years ago was known as the great American desert, but which under their labor now blooms with such beauty as to attract the cupidity of the land sharks, and bring down upon them and their titles the cloud of a Mexican land grant.

Out of the fifteen land grants in the Territory of Arizona I doubt whether two are valid. Since the men whom I have described have gone into that unknown land, braving the dangers of the country and bearing with manly fortitude the sufferings incident to frontier life in order to establish for themselves homes, these claims heve been dug up from the musty dust of ages, and are now held by land speculators in New York, San Francisco, and other large cities, not one of whom, with but a single exception, has ever for one day made Arizona his home, or who has added in any way to her growth or prosperity.

The present bill may very justly apply to New Mexico and Colorado with reference to the conditions existing there; the bill may be exactly right. It is well enough for the Delegate from New Mexico, and my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES], to say that this measure suits their people. Then let them have it. We urge no objection.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] says:

A voice has come up declaring the bill is wanted by those sections of the country.

But a very different voice comes to you from the Territory which I have the honor to represent, as I will show you later on. In Arizona wherever land subject to irrigation is found a Mexican land grant has been dug up or created and spread out over it. For instance, there is one modest little claim of 4,800,000 acres held by a certain Reavis, who bears gracefully the modest title of the Baron of the Colorados. This same Reavis and satellites are now in Washington working before this Congress and working in every way for the confirmation of this enormous, this monstrous fraud.

That Peralto grant has been "put where it would do the most good" to claimant.

It embraces the Salt and Gila Rivers and has within its boundaries the city of Phœnix, the town of Florence, and Globe City, and many other smaller settlements. Within it lie the majority of the farms in that great Territory. If this bill passes the claimant will file his petition, have process served on the occupants of these lands, which are probably already largely mortgaged, and force them at once into an expensive lawsuit, or else force them to give up their homes rather than undertake to hold possession at an expense equal if not superior to the actual value of the land. Such will be the immediate effect of the present measure.

At the appropriate time I shall move that Arizona be excluded from the operation of this bill, for such is the almost unanimous voice of my people, as expressed in letters, telegrams, and by resolutions of mass-meetings, and because my judgment sanctions this course. These people rightly urge that they have already suffered enough, and they ask, in the name of justice, that this great outrage be spared them.

The claim to which I have referred, resurrected from a period as remote as 1748, affects what is now a principality worth $50,000,000 even in its undeveloped state. Under this bill the man who claims title proposes to serve summons on each occupant of that body of land almost as large in extent as the State of Massachusetts. Under this condition the settler must give all he has either to the lawyer or the land-shark, and, whether successful or not, ruin meets him at the very threshold. That will be the effect so far as Arizona is concerned. In New Mexico the conditions, I learn, are somewhat different.

Mr. PAYSON. How is there any difference as to the proof of the validity of the claims?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. There is a difference in the character of the claims—not in the manner of proof. The difference is this: Arizona has not been settled as long as New Mexico. Great numbers of people living in New Mexico are settled on small holdings. The Mexicans, and their fathers before them, have lived there for years. There ought to be some easy and speedy and costless mode devised for settling the title to these small holdings of less than 160 acres. The condition of this class appeals to Congress, and should receive its attention; and I understand that the Delegate from New Mexico favors this bill largely on account of the relief to them which he sees in it.

But in Arizona there are none of these old and small holdings. The claims set up there are to large bodies of land on which are large and prosperous settlements of industrious people, holding patent from the United States. What might prove a great benefit to the small land-holder in New Mexico might prove a calamity to the small holder in Arizona. My protest comes from my desire and my purpose to see that the many farmers owning 160 acres shall not be blackmailed and robbed under the forms of law, in order that the hereditary owner of like tracts of land in New Mexico may secure title to his farm.

I fear the easy mode for New Mexico's small claimant may prove an equally easy mode for the land-thief in Arizona.

Mr. HOUK. How can fraud be practiced before the court which this bill proposes to establish?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Easily enough. Parties go to Spain or Mexico and buy a title that never did exist. They will come with it properly certified for admission as evidence in court. They come with a duly certified copy of originals not found in the archives of Spain or Mexico. What chance, when the trial is on hand, has the poor settler to disprove these muniments of title.

Mr. HOUK. Does the gentleman think President Cleveland would appoint a court that would permit such frauds as that to pass?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. The fault does not lie with the judge on the bench. He is bound to administer justice according to evidence. The evidence being admissible and not disproved, the court must find in favor of the lie. I have no fear of any judge that the President may appoint. The man I fear is the land shark, who will by forgery and perjury impose on the court, and do it so well as to deceive even the elect.

Mr. HOUK. It struck me that this bill was so framed that probably it would stop the land thief.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. If I entertained such hope I would cheerfully give my cordial support to the measure. I do not entertain the hope that this bill will have that effect. The presence of Reavis here lobbying for its passage is evidence alone sufficient to determine my opposition. What he wants I do not want. He wants all Arizona. He shall not have it. If an equally fraudulent claim had not kept the baron off the San Pedro River we would find his lines running from the Lower San Pedro to the line of New Mexico. But in effect it makes very little difference whether the baron should claim the San Pedro, under his alleged grant, or whether equal frauds should claim it as they now do under the Tres Alamos title.

Do you wonder that my people view with just alarm any measure which may even tend to aid the land-grabber in his unholy work? Their conspiracies are so secret, their money so inexhaustible, their conscience so flexible, their purpose so settled, their ingenuity so cunning, and their design so damnable that as long as I am honored with a place on this floor I will never cease to denounce their conduct or oppose their schemes. [Applause.] I know that certain parties who have been trying to get title to this Peralto grant through the Department of the Interior—and luckily for us have failed—are now endeavoring to secure the passage of this bill.

For what purpose? Do they find it easier to impose on courts than on a Department unhampered by technical rules of evidence? Through the agency of our honored, able, honest, and incorruptible surveyor-general we have been enabled to block this piratical game, where men's homes were the stakes for which it was being played.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office has likewise been wide awake to the necessity of preserving these lands from spoliation. Brought at last to bay at every turn in the Department, they now seek the erection of a court in which to practice their fraud.

It would have been better for the people, more just to claimants of valid titles, and far more advantageous to the Government in the resulting prosperity of these Territories, if every acre of land claimed under Spanish or Mexican titles could have been at once appropriated to the public domain, and the claimants, in lieu of land occupied by those settlers who had redeemed the wilderness by their industry, be allowed an indemnity commensurate with the value of the land claimed at the date of the treaty. This course then would have insured tranquillity to titles and promoted the development of the Territories on the basis of modern civilization. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK], perhaps, does not understand how Mexican land-grant titles can be manufactured. Money enough can always buy Mexican title to American land.

Any man with $5,000 can take a trip into Mexico and bring back a title to any part of the public domain, and that same title will appear as nice on its face as anything you ever saw.

I instance in this very connection the Sopori land grant in Arizona, a bill for confirmation of which has been at this session introduced in the Senate. Also, the El Paso de los Agodones grant, in the same Territory, for the forfeiture of which I have introduced in this House the proper bill. There are others, also, in point, that for time I forbear now to mention.

Mr. MCCREARY. If frauds such as the gentleman mentions are attempted, how can we better settle these private land claims than by the establishment of a court or commission?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I can show you very readily. Pass the bill which I have introduced on this very question of settling these land claims. I propose to introduce that bill as an amendment to this when I submit my proposed motion to exclude Arizona from the operation of this land court. I shall then propose my bill as a substitute for Arizona, and that my idea on this important question may be made known to the House I now send to the desk and ask the Clerk to read. The Clerk will wait till I catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. MCCREARY. Let me ask the gentleman, if he proposes to strike out Arizona, why he proposes an amendment with reference to New Mexico and Colorado?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. The amendment does not affect New Mexico or Colorado. I introduce it because I want it to apply to Arizona. I do not propose by it to interfere with any measure desired by the distinguished gentlemen from that State and Territory.

Mr. MCCREARY. Are you not willing that Arizona shall take your own amendment?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. If the gentleman will wait a few moments he will see the reason on which I base the distinction.

Mr. MCCREARY. But if the amendment is good enough for New Mexico it ought to be good enough for Arizona.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. It may be good enough for New Mexico if she wants it. I do not represent New Mexico, and, as I said before, my amendment applies only to Arizona. I can probably best discover to the House my position on this question by again asking the Clerk to read what I have just sent to the desk.

Mr. MCCREARY. It is, of course, Mr. Chairman, understood that I reserve any point of order which may be made against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that it is only read for information at this time as a part of the gentleman's remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed to strike out "Arizona" wherever it occurs, and at the end of the bill add as follows:

"Private land claims in Arizona shall be settled in the following manner:

"That it is hereby declared that in assuming the obligations of Mexico to her citizens within the Territory of Arizona ceded to the United States, it was the intention of the United States, as expressed in the treaties of cession, and as required by the comity of nations, to assume such obligations, and none other, as were incumbent on the Mexican Government at the dates respectively mentioned in the treaties of cession; and it shall not be competent for any officer or tribunal of the United States to presume by inference, conjecture, or construction, in any case, an intention of Congress, by any statute passed in pursuance of treaty stipulations or acts of Congress thereunder, to make a grant de novo to any claimant in Arizona under a Spanish or Mexican grant, or to grant or confirm to any such claimant anything not individually possessed under Spanish or Mexican laws, or to confirm any claim for a quantity of land greater in any case than the quantity authorized to be granted and actually granted in that case under the laws of Spain or Mexico; nor shall any grant be respected or recognized which had not been located, and duly recorded in the archives of Mexico, and reduced to actual possession as private property at the date fixed by the respective treaties of cession for the recognition and acknowledgment of legitimate titles, nor shall mineral lands, nor lands occupied or reserved for public purposes or national defense, nor lands in the occupation of native Mexican or Indian inhabitants at the date of grant be held or deemed to have been included in any grant or concession by the Spanish or Mexican Governments, or to be embraced within the general terms of any confirmation by the United States, in the absence of an express grant and confirmation of such particular lands; nor shall grants or concessions conferring a common right of occupation only be held or deemed to be a conveyance of the fee-simple title, or as vesting any individual right in or to such common lands.

"SEC. 2. That no claim under any alleged Spanish or Mexican land grant within the Territory of Arizona ceded by Mexico to the United States shall be entertained or recognized by any surveyor-general or other officer of the United States before the original evidences of grant, or duly certified copies thereof from the original records of the Government under which the grant is claimed, shall have been filed in the office of the surveyor-general, and the authenticity thereof satisfactorily established; nor shall any segregation survey be made or reservation created or hereafter maintained on account of any Spanish or Mexican private land claim until Congress shall have confirmed the same as a legitimate title under the laws of Mexico as the same existed at the date fixed by treaty of cession for the recognition of legitimate titles; nor shall any survey be made or reservation created or maintained, or patent issued for a greater quantity of land on account of any confirmed private land claim than the quantity expressly mentioned in the act of confirmation, nor, in case of confirmations heretofore made without express mention of quantity, shall any claim be surveyed or patented or lands reserved therefor for a greater quantity of land than the quantity lawfully granted and claimed and actually possessed as private property at the date of the treaty of cession; and all private land claims within the Territories mentioned exceeding in the area claimed the quantity of land which citizens of the United States are authorized to acquire under the homestead and pre-emption laws, and which have not heretofore been lawfully presented and prima facie established, and which shall not be presented to the surveyor-general authorized to receive the same within one year from the date of this act, with authentic evidences of grant and proofs of actual property possession at the date of the treaty of cession, shall be deemed definitively abandoned, and the same shall thereafter be forever barred.

"SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of surveyors-general charged under existing laws with the investigation of private land claims to forthwith proceed, under the direction of the President of the United States, to make a thorough examination and investigation of all unconfirmed and unpatented claims which have heretofore been presented, or which hereafter may be presented as provided in this act; and the proper and necessary expenses of such examination and investigation shall be paid on the order of the President from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"SEC. 4. That the surveyor-general shall render a decision on each claim finally examined by him or above provided, and if his decision be in favor of the United States an appeal therefrom shall lie to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior; and final decisions of the Executive Department adverse to claimants shall be conclusive. If the decision of the surveyor-general be in favor of the claimant, the same shall be subject to review by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, and all claims approved by the Secretary of the Interior upon such examination, investigation, and review shall be reported to Congress for its action with a view to the confirmation of just and bona fide claims as provided by treaty stipulation.

"SEC. 5. That all claims now pending before Congress upon reports of the surveyor-general recommending their rejection, where such recommendations have been concurred in by the Commissioner of the General Land office or the Secretary of the Interior, or not non-concurred in by either of said officers, be, and the same are hereby, finally rejected, and the lands embraced therein or heretofore reserved on account of such claims shall be open to homestead entry by actual inhabitants thereon from and after the passage of this act; and all other claims now pending before Congress are hereby remanded to the Secretary of the Interior for investigation and action as provided in this act.

"SEC. 6. That final reports upon all claims investigated and approved as provided in this act shall be made to Congress on or before the 1st day of January, 1890.

"SEC. 7. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Now, Mr. Chairman, the object of that amendment is plainly seen by those gentlemen who have heard it read from the desk.

It not only aims at an early settlement of these claims, but designs to forever put a stop to a custom which very strangely grew in the land office several years ago, to which I direct your attention. The Department at the time referred to recommended to the Committee on Appropriations that necessity existed for an appropriation of money for survey of unconfirmed land grants. The appropriation was first made by Congress in response to that request, and worked great hardship, as will soon appear.

Under the act of 1854, there was no intention that surveys should be made of unconfirmed land grants.

That act requires first a confirmation of the grant by Congress, and the survey followed Congressional approval of the grant. Under this appropriation evil immediately sprang up and grew vigorously, for when the appropriation was exhausted the claimants to these large tracts would advance to the surveyors-general the requisite amount of money and have an official survey made and hold a claim on the Government for the amount advanced.

Now for the effect of this. Whenever a survey takes place under the act of 1854 the land by that very act becomes segregated from the public domain and can not be sold or settled upon, and it remains thus until Congress either confirms or rejects the grant. By obtaining such surveys and thus segregating much of the land from the public domain the land-grant claimants have placed New Mexico in the condition from which she very justly demands speedy relief. No one will settle on the land, because it is withdrawn from entry or settlement. The land thus withdrawn lies idle with no settlers upon it. In Arizona the case is very different.

Thanks to the new administration of affairs, no appropriation has been or will be asked for survey of unconfirmed land claims, and if asked I am sure will be recommended by committee or passed by the House.

In my Territory the people are upon the lands and no segregation survey has been made. They are not afraid of these frauds as long as Congress and an honest surveyor-general and an efficient, conscientious Commissioner have control of the situation. Why change this settlement to the judicial arm of the Government, which, from its very nature, is unable to unearth the fraud in all its dark and loathsome ramifications? This bill instead of relieving my people from embarrassment will only tend, if passed, to cast a cloud upon their titles and involve them in new and unnecessary difficulty. The filing of a suit becomes a lis pendens and at once puts a brake on the wheels of our rapidly advancing development.

It is apparent that the necessity which prompts New Mexico and Colorado to ask for the passage of this bill does not exist in Arizona, has no tendency to improve the condition of affairs there, and instead of remedying the existing evil only throws new difficulties in the way of the people whose courage and endurance have made it possible for the land thief to invade the soil. My people, Mr. Chairman, are on the lands now. They have lived upon them for years, and to the improvement of their homes have given long and wearily the burden and sweat of honest toil. They are confident of their title. No one is alarmed under present conditions except the speculator, as is shown by one of several resolutions adopted by mass meetings of citizens living on some of these alleged grants, which resolution I have temporarily mislaid, but will have it in a few moments, and which will show that we are not afraid of the crucial test to which Congress can submit these alleged claims, and which, in the very nature of things, courts can not properly investigate.

My people do fear bought testimony, perjured evidence, and forged title papers, and hence oppose this bill and favor my proposed amendment. Observe, if you please, the condition in which the present bill will place the settler. They will stand, at the summons of the land grabber, naked and helpless before the court. They have been afforded no opportunity to know on what the plaintiff relies to sustain his title. They have had no means of ascertaining the genuineness of the papers introduced in evidence. The Government has offered no facilities by which its own patent can be maintained against a fraud perpetrated under the solemn provisions of a national treaty. The Government has shirked in this particular a plain duty, as I may yet show before the final vote on this measure.

Another suggestion here presents itself. The official who under this bill may be appointed to hear the evidence in these cases will be a stranger among the people unless there should be a radical change of precedent. He must hear the evidence as presented and decide the law as it is. He can know nothing of the character of the witnesses, and $50,000,000 at stake will enlighten many a dormant memory in Arizona or anywhere else.

I am alarmed, and I think justly, at the probable consequences flowing or to flow from such conditions. I have not the time to amplify the idea here merely suggested, and must pass on.

The bill introduced by me some time ago may not solve wholly the difficult problem now confronting us, but I am free to say reaches a great distance in that direction, and with a proper amendment of the act of 1854 I have no doubt that our trouble may soon be solved and absolute justice done both to the claimant and the settler.

Mr. Chairman, I confess an abiding interest in and a deep sympathy for that man who, under adverse fortune, braves the hardship and danger of frontier life and manfully labors to better the condition of himself and those relying on him for subsistence. Such should receive what protection Government under our system can give. The more fortunate are generally quite able to take care of themselves.

As illustrating fully the reasons actuating Arizona's opposition to this bill, I pass to the desk and ask the Clerk to read the resolutions adopted by a mass meeting assembled on this same Peralto grant.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolutions unanimously passed by the citizens of Salt River Valley in mass meeting assembled.

Whereas there has been introduced into the Senate and House of Representatives bills to create a commission for the settlement of the Spanish grants in Arizona, New Mexico, and Colorado; and

Whereas the intent of these bills is to transfer the adjudication of such claims from the political to the judicial arm of the Government; and

Whereas we regard the introduction of these bills as an attempt to create a commission similar to that which in early days opened wide the doors for fraud and rascality in the settlement of Spanish grants in California; and

Whereas the prosperity of Arizona is bound up in the honest settlement of the land grants situated therein, almost all of which are fraudulent and which cover in the aggregate about ten millions of acres of the best and most productive lands on the continent on which are erected millions of dollars of improvement: Therefore,

Resolved by the citizens of the Salt River Valley, Arizona, in mass meeting assembled, That the passage by Congress of either of the bills now pending before it is a menace to their prosperity inasmuch as it opens the door for litigation which a generation will not see settled; that we have bought our lands from the Government, entered upon and improved the same in the knowledge and belief that the political and not the judicial arm of the Government had the power to adjudicate the rights of claimants under Spanish or Mexican land grants, and that any attempt to transfer such power to a commission would be unwise, unjust, and impolitic; that claimants under Spanish land grants have all the protection required in presenting their claims to the Land Department, and in the final confirmation by Congress if their grants are valid; and that we, a people directly interested to the extent of our homes and possessions, are willing to trust to the honesty, fairness, and justice of representatives of the nation to deal equitably as between settler and claimant in the settlement of land titles in this Territory, and that as citizens of the United States without a direct voice in its government, we earnestly protest against the passage of any act changing any manner the law as it exists at present.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be telegraphed by the chairman of this meeting to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate of the United States to be laid before their respective bodies, as the expression of the wishes and desires of the people of Maricopa County, whose every material interest is bound up in the proper solution of this land question.

The chairman then addressed a few remarks to the meeting, wherein he showed that some of the alleged land claims were now completely dead, but that the claimants were attempting to revive them by having this court of claims established.

Maj. J. W. Evans moved the adoption of the resolutions, which motion was seconded. The resolutions were then discussed by Mr. L. Fowler, H. H. Logan, Dr. L. H. Goodrich, W. J. Murphy, and others, and the resolutions were then unanimously adopted as read.

Mr. Farish offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the chairman and secretary of this meeting send a copy of the resolutions adopted to our Delegate in Congress, MARCUS A. SMITH, and request him to use his influence to defeat any and all bills creating a land commission for the settlement of land grants.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to ask the gentleman from Arizona whether any suits have been brought in the United States courts with regard to these grants?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. None that I know of where the title was directly at issue. In one or two cases the question has come incidentally before the court and decision had thereon as to boundary and extent of certain grants.

Mr. BLAND. Is there anything to prevent these suits going to the courts?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I thank the honorable gentleman from Missouri for the suggestion apparent in his question.

I do not know whether, under a strict construction of the act of 1854, it would be permissible or not. If not, and a court is to be insisted on, why not amend the act of 1854 so that our local courts can assume jurisdiction rather than to impose new and expensive courts on us? I would much prefer this to the mode prescribed by the bill under discussion. But the advocates of this bill claim that our local courts are already overcrowded with business. Congress seems to entertain a different opinion, for only a short time ago a bill introduced by me, asking the creation of a new judicial district in Arizona, was adversely reported to the House by the Committee on the Judiciary on the ground that our courts were not crowded with business. At all events, it would be much cheaper to create new districts and have these causes tried in a court and before a judge acquainted alike with the people and with the arts and devices of the land sharks.

There are only fifteen claims in Arizona as far as heard from, and three or four of these are confessedly fraudulent and have been abandoned by the claimants.

A MEMBER. How many are there behind yet?

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. No one can tell that. But the amendment to be proposed by me will make these silent ones speak out or forever hold their peace, and that, too, very quickly.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I have only this to say: A speedy, fair, and just way should be provided for the settlement of these grants. I do not think the present bill comprehends the emergency. Even as things now are a valid title can be easily confirmed; but the trouble is, the claimants can now hold back as long as they please, and like the dog in the manger, unable to eat the hay, insist on preventing those who like it from indulging. Congress is honest enough and fair enough to confirm a valid title. Then why do the claimants hesitate to seek speedy redress? The answer suggests itself to every member on this floor. If they have a title clean, straight, and honest, a title free from fraud, perjury, and forgery, a title recognized by the spirit animating the treaty, no difficulty stands in the way. Otherwise the crucial test of a committee's liberal examination will give great trouble.

As I before remarked, a court, from its very nature, is unable to cope with the far-reaching fraud on which many of these titles are erected. It is the duty of Congress, at the expense of the Government, to thoroughly examine these titles, and confirm the good and reject the spurious. Congress owes it to the people, and this long-neglected duty should be carefully yet speedily executed. The proper course, I trust, suggested itself to experienced legislators. Whether that course will be taken and that duty performed remains to be seen

At all events, the present bill will force a trial where the money is all on one side and the scattered poor and helpless people on the other. I most sincerely hope that Arizona will be excluded from the operation of this bill, and in the name of those people I here enter their solemn protest against it in its unamended form.

Mr. SYMES. If members of this House who have not had an opportunity to become familiar with the provisions of this bill had any doubt about the propriety of its passage, I guaranty that doubt has been removed by the speech of the gentleman from Arizona. He has assisted me in picturing so well and so clearly the reasons why this bill ought to become a law that it will not be necessary to occupy so much time as I had intended.

No one who has lived in the West will dispute the statement of the gentleman from Arizona, that there are fraudulent land-grant claims made for large tracts of land in Arizona, New Mexico, and Colorado; that those claims are made under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden treaty; that within the boundaries of these large land-grant claims there are settlements where the people have occupied tracts of land in many instances for over forty years and from that period up to one hundred years, having received them through their ancestors, grantors, or predecessors in interest; and that their little farms to-day which they have occupied in the way I have mentioned are endangered and rendered almost valueless. They can not sell them in the market. The people are afraid to improve them. Every one is afraid to buy and improve such farms by bringing an irrigating ditch or building a house. And why? For the reason the gentleman from Arizona has explained.

There are large land grants the exterior boundaries of which extend in such a way as to include all these little claims and farms.

What has been the result of thirty-four years of effort on the part of this Government in carrying out in good faith the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden treaty and the rules of international law? Let us see. Under the act of July 2, 1854, referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], it was provided that the surveyor-general should survey these claims—these large and small grants—and attempt to fix the boundaries thereof, take the testimony that should be presented in support of them, and make his reports to the Secretary of the Interior or to the Land Department.

Under that act of 1854 the surveyor-general of Arizona has been proceeding since 1870 and the surveyor-general of New Mexico since 1854. What has been accomplished?

Mr. Chairman, it appears that during those thirty-four years one thousand claims have been presented, and one hundred and fifty of that thousand claims have been reported to Congress, and Congress has acted on seventy-one of them. Let me add, sir, that out of the seventy-one claims that have been acted upon by Congress there have been confirmed and patents have been issued for a number of claims which it is now conceded include millions of acres more than ought to have been included within their boundaries. But under the defective legislation of Congress, under the proceedings that I have referred to, the political department of the Government not being competent to adjudicate these matters and settle the rights of parties in matters where the cupidity of man has been incited to such an extent that subornation of perjury has cut an important figure, we find that patents have been issued for grants for millions of acres more than it is now known by public and general notoriety they ever ought to have included.

Who is responsible for it? Simply the defective system, simply the attempt to make a temporary surveyor-general of a Territory settle property rights under treaties that require a court of justice. If this bill had been passed in 1854, instead of that section of the act which I have referred to, these land titles would have been settled long ago. All these little claimants would have been confirmed in their rights, and the fortunate grantees—and we should not envy them their grants if they own them and they are legal—the possessors of grants from the Mexican and Spanish Governments of tracts containing from fifty to several hundred thousand acres, would have been confirmed in their rights, and their claims would have been eliminated from the public domain by a judicial proceeding—a judicial judgment that would be clear from the aspersions and charges of fraud, and every claim of any size that has been confirmed would not have been a matter of public scandal by charges and countercharges.

How can these evils be avoided is the question members of this House are called upon to-day to determine. I answer, sir, in the light of history; I answer in the light of personal experience, and I appeal to this House and to every member in it to state whether or not the evolutions of civilization in this century or any other have been able to mature and to affirmatively adopt and carry out any system of proceedings that will eliminate right from wrong and protect the weak and innocent from the strong and the poor from the rich, except the judicial investigation of a court of justice? I am not going to dwell upon this theme. I only call the attention of members of the House to it, because I have watched it and have felt ashamed of my country when I have been called upon in certain ways to investigate as a lawyer the proceedings for the confirmation of private land grants in and by and through the political department of the Government.

I have no doubt, sir, that Commissioners of the General Land Office and Secretaries of the Interior have been placed in that situation where Senators and Members of the House were going to them in behalf of a land-claim syndicate upon the one side, while other Senators and Representatives were going to them in behalf of their constituents upon the other, discussing the matter, pointing out the merits, ignoring the testimony; and the result has been that these claims have been tied up indefinitely, many of them for over thirty years, and those that have been confirmed by Congress and patented have been charged to be fraudulent, and applications, years thereafter, have been made to the Attorney-General to authorize bills in equity to be filed to set aside the patents. Why, sir, the United States Government has paid for special counsel, in suits attempting to set aside the patents issued on confirmations by Congress for the Maxwell and other land grants, to the amount of over $50,000 in the last few years. Will any gentleman say that if this bill had become a law in 1854 the means provided in it would not have resulted in confirming those titles for the proper amounts of land a great many years ago and rejecting the fraudulent claims?

So much by way of a general statement in reply to the argument of my friend from Arizona. I wish now to refer for a few moments to the protection which this bill will give to that large class of claimants who, as Governor Ross says in his clear and logical argument before the Committee on Territories, occupy somewhat the position of squatters upon these lands.

Mr. Chairman, all through that country ceded to us by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, up and down the little valleys, and along the little creeks where irrigation has been practicable, without any great expense, we find Mexican settlements, settlements by men who were Mexican citizens. They came within the sovereignty of this Government under the treaties referred to. They have lived there, they and their ancestors, for generations. They have inherited their lands under what may be called a title by prescription, and to-day they are confronted with the difficulty which the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has pointed out, by finding their little farms within the exterior boundaries of some large land grants for which a paper title is claimed from the Mexican or the Spanish Government. As I have already said, this practically destroys the value of their lands.

Now, how does this bill propose to deal with this class of claimants? It provides that this land court shall be divided into three departments; that one of these justices shall sit at Denver, Colo., one at Santa Fé, N. Mex., and the other at Tucson, Ariz. It provides that these small claimants may come before any of these departments of the court and produce their proofs, and all that they are required under the provisions of this bill to prove is that they, their ancestors or grantors, have occupied their little farms for more than forty years.

Mr. SAYERS. Does not the gentleman think that forty years is too long? Would not ten years be long enough?

Mr. SYMES. I am inclined to think that forty years is too long. I am inclined, on the other hand, to think that ten years might be a little too short. Those who have settled within ten years or about that time are generally a class of people who had good opportunity for finding out whether they were settling within a grant or not, and wherever there is a just grant or a good paper title, which the good faith of this Government, under the treaties mentioned, demands should be confirmed, it would not be just to deprive the grantee of his rights simply because within the last ten or fifteen years somebody had settled upon the land.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman speaks of a grantee who has never taken a step in half a century to acquire possession.

Mr. SYMES. I say it would be unjust to deprive the grantee of his rights because the Government of the United States has failed to carry out in any ordinary and effective way the settlement of these rights and titles under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

This is intended to establish title without further proof than occupancy of the owners—the people who settled there for a certain number of years, say from twenty to twenty-five. Could anything be more just?

Mr. SPRINGER. The titles which existed at the time of the cession are now forty years old. If they claim under those titles they must be at least that old. If they claim, however, under the homestead law, they need only prove occupancy for five years.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Chairman, this bill makes no attempt to change the homestead or any other of the land laws of the United States. This bill, on the contrary, simply seeks to execute in good faith the provision of our treaties to all parties concerned in these private land claims.

A MEMBER. It is immaterial whether it was five or seven years, because, if Mexican and Spanish grants, they must be given to the parties concerned.

Mr. SYMES. On this branch of the subject I desire to say, in behalf of the hundreds and perhaps thousands of small claimants, that in my judgment no stronger obligation ever appealed to the Congress of the United States than the one now pending to confirm the titles of those who occupy small tracts of land, which are often embraced within the exterior boundaries of large paper estates, and which are included within the exterior boundaries of large grants, by which it is sought to take away these small holdings from those who have settled upon them and cultivated them for so many years.

Let me, Mr. Chairman, in that connection, suggest that I do not see how this bill could be improved in that particular. Of course there are gentlemen here who will claim that the Interior Department can carry out this object as well as a new court. They claim if you will only give the Interior Department power to appoint certain of these special agents to travel all over the Western country and look up titles and report to some agent, and that agent reports to the Commissioner, the Commissioner decides, parties can then appeal to the Secretary of the Interior; and the Secretary of the Interior will pass upon it, and finally, sir, having reached a conclusion, the claim is reported to Congress, a bill is reported to confirm it, that bill goes onto the Private Calendar of the House, and is never acted on. This has been the general result for thirty years. In that way I contend you will not be able to settle the title to these small claims, nor will you be able to settle satisfactorily the large ones.

I wish to add, Mr. Chairman, the adjudication of the large claims, if the lawyers in this House will think for a moment, is inseparably connected in this tribunal, or in any other, with the adjudication of these small claims. If A proceeds in this court with a paper title involving a grant of a million acres, the exterior boundaries may include a hundred small claims, each containing a few acres, and which have furnished a livelihood to their owners for a century, these claims held by the Mexican population or their ancestors at the time of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. I say you can not adjudicate any of these little claims for a few acres of ground without incidentally deciding paper-grant titles, the exterior boundaries of which include these small claims, except by this limitation of forty years.

Now, the court provided under this bill is directed, if these people shall file a petition making a claim for these holdings which they have occupied and proving they have occupied them for a certain number of years, not to require them to make further proof of title. Upon the presentation of that proof it is provided by this bill that their muniment of title shall be given to them by the court, regardless of the fact that the small grant may be included within the exterior boundaries of one of these large paper-title grants.

In reference to the large paper grants where they are valuable, after the decision in the court provided by this bill, they will, of course, be appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there the title will be finally settled.

Mr. LIND. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him, why limit these small claims to 160 acres each? Gentlemen who know say many of them amount to 400 acres.

Mr. SYMES. I am not prepared to answer the question why, under the limitations of the bill, small claimants shall not exceed 160 acres. I am told that in the main these small farms do not exceed 160 acres. The governor of New Mexico is in favor of the bill, and the Delegate from that Territory on this floor also favors its passage; and it is to be assumed they know what is best for the interests of their constituents.

I wish now to address myself to the justice of the bill, and especially with reference to the large claims where the claimants hold them under paper titles. I do not desire to stand here simply for the purpose of indulging in cheap demagogy on this bill by invoking any rule of law, any rule of necessity which does not exist, in order to try and defeat large grants to which good titles are held under the treaties. I do not stand here to say this Congress has any right in justice and equity to defeat the grant of A, or to cut down its boundaries, if the grant comes within the guaranties of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo or the Gadsden treaty.

But I do say there never was a greater dereliction of duty on the part of this Government than to allow these claims to remain unsettled, and to allow their boundaries to stand in a state of absolute uncertainty for the last thirty-five years, when it must have been apparent that under the present system they never would be settled.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there were a large number of these claims. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] says that this bill will not protect the Government, and will not protect the small claimants, nor will it protect the public domain from the ravages of these imaginary large grant claims.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the particular provisions of this bill will protect the Government, will protect the settlers upon the public domain, and will protect all parties interested. Why, sir, this tribunal is a land court. It is organized with three justices, and all of these large claimants will go before the court in banc when these claims are pending before this land court of three justices (who will be distinguished lawyers, no doubt), and the claims will have to rest upon legal and proper proofs.

There will be no Commissioner of the Land Office for men of great political influence to solicit and explain to about the merits or demerits of any particular claim.

There will be no delegations going to the judges of that court like they have in the past gone to the Secretary of the Interior, talking about political influence. I am sorry I have to make such comments. It does not reflect upon any living man, and I do not intend it as such.

It simply reflects upon the defective character of a system; and it reflects upon the comprehension, it seems to me, of any man who suggests that you can settle private-land claims between the Government and the claimants, or between the adverse claimants themselves, by a political department of the Government pulled upon one side or the other in the way we know they are by common custom. It does not reflect in one scintilla, sir, upon these men. It only reflects upon the idea that you can turn a political department of the Government into a court of justice for the adjudication of property rights.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say but a word more upon this question of testimony or the character of testimony in this case. My friend from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] says this tribunal will be, I think he said, a good opening for fraudulent land claims. Sir, I think the history of litigation in the courts of this country will disabuse the minds of members of this House of any idea of danger in that regard.

Why, sir, if any adverse claimant comes into this court and says that he has reason to believe that these imaginary paper titles which exist and are referred to by my friend from Arizona are not bona fide, good titles, that the papers are forgeries, or that there is fraud in connection with them, what is the result?

Why, sir, if the court or the United States attorney is not satisfied with investigation of the matter, it may refer it through the Secretary of State to the Government at Madrid, or the City of Mexico, and our representatives there are required to make an investigation into the character of the alleged paper title. They are required to go to the original archives of these governments and find out the true source of these paper titles to which my friend from Arizona has referred, and which he was afraid would walk into court in broad daylight carrying so much fraud upon them.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if that is the case, in the name of common sense and justice how will my friend eliminate these fraudulent titles in Arizona from the public domain and protect the people thereon? If my friend says that this does not offer the necessary machinery for the investigation of these claims, that it does not provide for an attorney of the United States skilled in this branch of the law, that the President is not likely to appoint judges skilled in this department of the law, that we can not send experts if necessary to the archives of Spain and Mexico to decide whether the original papers claimed as genuine are forgeries or not—when all that machinery is given this court with power of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States—if, I say, under such circumstances you can not eliminate fraud, I ask my friend to suggest to this House how it can be done.

Sir, I hope this bill will pass. I hope we will take these questions of title into court, and thereby administer justice and the law.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker took the chair.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 3957) for the relief of Peter Marck, Thomas J. Wright, administrator, and others; and

A bill (S. 2550) appropriating $20,000 for the expenses of special and select committees of the Senate.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. McCREARY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Mexi o [Mr. JOSEPH].

Mr. JOSEPH. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill is to settle the titles to private land claims in New Mexico and in a part of Arizona and Colorado. The security of land titles is an absolute essential to the development of any country. No settler can be induced to occupy and improve land from which he is liable to be evicted by the assertion of a superior title. Persons in possession are deterred from making substantial improvements when there is a possibility that their lands and all their improvements may fall into the hands of others claiming by adverse title. The importance of this bill is shown by the number of acres of land the title to which is to be decided under its provisions. No exact figures are accessible, but partial estimates will exhibit the enormous extent of the territory. The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1881 (The Public Domain, page 406), shows that the land grants in New Mexico and Colorado, whose confirmation had been recommended on June 30, 1880, amounted to 4,294,672 acres. At the same date there had been 146,256 acres in Arizona recommended for confirmation, all under private land grants. These figures do not include the number of acres claimed under the same grants, all of which is reserved from settlement, the number of acres for which no claim has been filed, or the number of acres for which claims have been filed, but which have been rejected or not yet reported on.

The committee estimate in their report (House Report No. 675) that the total number of acres claimed under private land grants in New Mexico is about 10,000,000 acres; in Colorado, about 3,000,000 acres, and in Arizona, about 500,000 acres, making altogether the enormous territory of 13,500,000 acres, almost equal to the combined area of the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Hampshire. It is the title to this enormous extent of country which this bill proposes to settle. All the evils of unsettled titles have existed there for now nearly forty years, and this, too, in spite of the fact that nearly forty years ago the solemn pledge of the United States was given by treaty stipulation for their settlement. By the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, of February 2, 1848, known as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the present Territory of New Mexico was ceded to the United States. This treaty provided that all property rights of Mexican citizens should be respected; and by the subsequent treaty of December 30, 1853, known as the "Gadsden treaty," this provision was confirmed. Its terms are as follows, (Article VIII, 9 Statutes at Large, page 115):

> Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said territories, or disposing thereof and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.

But the property rights thus confirmed could not be fully respected unless means were adopted by the United States to settle the boundaries between public and private domain. This obligation was necessarily inherent in the treaty stipulation, and was fully recognized by the passage of the act of July 22, 1854, entitled "An act to establish the office of surveyor-general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes." By the eighth section of that act it was made the duty of the surveyor-general to investigate all claims to land in the Territory of New Mexico under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico, and to report upon all such claims. The law further provided that the report should be laid before Congress for its action "with a view to confirm bona fide grants and give full effect to the treaty of 1848 between the United States and Mexico;" and in order that the rights guaranteed in this treaty should be in no manner infringed, it was further provided by the same act that "until the final action of Congress upon such claims, all lands covered thereby shall be reserved from sale or other disposal by the Government, and shall not be subject to the donation granted by the previous provisions of this act."

These provisions of law were extended to Colorado by the act of February 28, 1861 (12 Statutes at Large, page 176), and to Arizona by the act of July 15, 1870 (16 Statutes at Large, page 304). The purpose of Congress was to carry out the provisions of treaty stipulations; but, unfortunately, the means adopted were wholly ineffectual. The Secretary of the Interior, in his report for 1880 (page 32), says:

> After a lapse of nearly thirty years, more than one thousand claims have been filed with the surveyors-general, of which less than one hundred and fifty have been reported to Congress, and, of the number so reported, Congress has finally acted upon only seventy-one.

That number has not since then been increased. This act has now been in operation for thirty-four years, and but 7 per cent. of the claims filed under it have been disposed of. At the same rate of progress it must be several centuries before all these claims are acted upon under existing law. It is therefore not surprising that the same Secretary of the Interior says of this law (Report for 1880, page 32):

> Its operation has been a failure, amounting to a denial of justice both to the claimants and to the United States.

While the evils to the owners of valid claims are thus apparent, what is to be said of the great injury to the public in the reservation of enormous areas of land by the mere filing of a claim? Under the act of 1854 the whole tract claimed is by the mere fact of presentation of the claim reserved from disposition by the Government. The settlement and development of the country are wholly barred.

> The construction of railroads through New Mexico and Arizona, and the consequent influx of population into these Territories, renders it imperatively necessary that these claims should be finally settled with the least possible delay. (Report Secretary Interior, 1880.)

Year after year have successive Commissioners of the General Land Office and surveyors-general of New Mexico called attention to the necessity of some legislation to cure these evils, but Congress has turned a deaf ear to all complaints. On the one hand, Congress has refused to act upon the claims reported to it under the act of 1854 for confirmation, and, on the other hand, it has failed to create any tribunal to consider and decide the claims.

Every interest demands the promptest possible settlement; the owners of valid claims demand the fulfillment of treaty obligation, the people of the Territory in general demand the removal of this clog upon their progress, and the interest of the United States demands that lands to which no valid adverse title can be asserted should be recognized as a part of the national domain and furnish homes for bona fide settlers.

To determine what will be the most effective remedy for these pressing evils, regard must be had to all the circumstances. There is a prevailing impression in some directions that the land grants in New Mexico are generally of enormous size and for the greater part permeated with fraud. Many of them are for large tracts, and undoubtedly the chance of gaining possession of large areas has stimulated some fraudulent attempts against the Government. But probably 75 per cent. of the over one thousand claims already filed, and 95 per cent. of the claims which have never been filed are for less than 160 acres of land, and many of them for less than 80 acres, and this land is probably not generally worth over $2.50 per acre. It is therefore safe to say that the value of the land in controversy in more than four-fifths of all the cases of private land grants is not over $400. It is therefore apparent that any remedy proposed which involves expensive litigation for the assertion of title would be absolute confiscation of hundreds of homesteads. Any such remedy for existing evils would be a mockery, aiding the wealthy but absolutely ruining the poor. These small grants are ancestral homesteads, many of them in possession of the same families for over a century. There will be no dispute as to the title of these. Any tribunal upon the first examination will confirm the grants at once without hesitation. And these uncontested grants would outnumber ten to one the grants about which there could be any controversy.

The land covered by valid claims was never the property of the United States. The grants under which the present owners hold title were made, many of them, over a hundred years before the cession of the territory to the United States, and the object to be attained by the holders is not to get anything from the Government of the United States, but to free their own lands from the cloud upon the title caused by the failure of the United States to make provision for the proof of titles. To burden these homesteads with large bills of expense for an opportunity of establishing ownership would be an outrage. The treaty of 1848, too, in providing that citizens should retain their property

"without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever," would seem to oblige the United States, in fixing the delimitations between the property of citizens and of the United States, to do so without charge to them. This view of the treaty obligations has long been held by them as well as by the United States surveyors-general. (See Reports of Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1869, page 319, and for 1873, page 102.)

Whatever remedy is proposed must not in any event burden the owners of undisputed land grants with heavy bills of costs.

The remedy must also be prompt. For forty years has settlement been withheld. When it is made it should be made without needless delays. The surveyor-general of New Mexico in 1874 strongly painted the existing state of affairs (Report Commissioner General Land Office, 1874, page 113):

For want of a feeling of security as to title, sales of land, either by Government or grant claimants, in such regions is practically closed out, and will so remain until some relief is afforded by Congress.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office in his report for 1876 used this language (page 27):

In addition to the foregoing, I might add, that while these private land claims remain in their present unsettled condition it will continue to retard emigration to and settlement in said Territories; for, until the titles thereto are ascertained, and the land segregated from the public domain, it will be impossible to determine which is public land subject to appropriation and settlement under the public-land laws and which is not.

The surveyor-general in the same year thus spoke of the increase of difficulty with lapse of time (Report Commissioner General Land Office, 1876, page 231):

The longer the investigation of these titles and adjustment of these claims are deferred the more difficult does it become to distinguish between the legitimate and the illegitimate grants, and the greater the opportunity for perpetrating frauds and imposing manufactured paper titles upon the Government.

It is also an injustice to the proper claimant who desires to perfect his title, as it becomes more difficult to prove up his case as time lapses, and should he desire to dispose of his estate, its real value is depreciated from the fact that he can not show a perfect title by reason of the non-action of Congress in confirming his right to the same.

And in 1881 he used this language (Report Commissioner General Land Office, 1881, page 781):

The land-grant question is becoming more serious in this Territory as time lapses.

In his report for 1883, the Commissioner of the General Land Office speaks of the increase of evils with the lapse of time (page 11):

There is a further liability of the assertion of claims heretofore unknown. The increasing value of land, owing to the increased facilities of communication and the general settlement of all the Territories, invites the assertion of such claims, and is an incentive to the manufacture of fraudulent titles. The lapse of time favors claims of a doubtful character and especially favors a broad expansion of original claims.

No remedy will be adequate which permits the present condition of affairs to continue from year to year for another decade, but it must be such as will close promptly all cases save those whose complexity and uncertainty and magnitude demand the thorough scrutiny of the highest judicial tribunal of the country.

Finally, any tribunal to which these cases are referred must be of such intelligence as to be able to discriminate between valid and invalid grants, and for this purpose it must be armed with full powers to investigate every avenue of information, and it must be afforded the most ample and favorable opportunities for personal intimacy with the subject-matter of the grants. Without these qualifications the tribunal can not properly perform its functions.

Two tribunals have been proposed in other bills for the settlement of these cases—a special commission, or the Territorial courts.

This bill proposes the creation of a special land court of three judges, which shall hold special sessions, for six months, at Santa Fé, N. Mex.; Tucson, Ariz., and Denver, Colo., by individual judges, and shall, during the remainder of the year, sit at Washington.

The bill (H. R. 1968) presented by me and reported by the Committee on Territories, proposed the creation of a special commission, with appeals to the Territorial courts and thence to the Supreme Court of the United States. Under that bill it was provided that the commission should sit in various places in New Mexico and Arizona, in the vicinity of the land in question, and that testimony should be given orally before the commission and transcribed.

While I believe that the remedy proposed in that bill is the best adapted to the circumstances and affords the most favorable opportunity to the claimants to smaller grants to prove title to their homes without being involved in expenses consuming the entire value of their lands, nevertheless I am not willing to oppose any measure which offers any solution to the existing evils, since almost any remedy is better than the present uncertain condition of these land titles. The bill now before the House avoids some of the difficulties of a commission bill, and is, I believe, the next best solution of the difficult problem to that offered in the commission bill presented by me. By dividing the land court of three judges created by this bill into three departments and permitting each judge to hold court separately, with the right of appeal to the court in banc, expedition in disposing of these cases is secured. The title in the smaller cases is so clear and undisputed that there can be appeals in no more than 10 per cent. of the cases decided by the different departments of the court.

By holding sessions at Santa Fé, Tucson, and Denver during six months of every year, this court will become thoroughly familiar with all matters pertaining to private land claims, the old records at Santa Fé will be easily accessible, and claimants are given an opportunity either to take their testimony in writing or to present themselves and witnesses for oral examination before the court at Santa Fé, Tucson, or Denver.

Experience has shown in the past that special courts or commissions created for like purposes as this can act expeditiously on matters before them. Land titles in Mississippi were settled by two commissions sitting under the act of March 3, 1823 (2 Statutes at Large, 229).

These two boards adjourned September 21, 1805. Allowing for delays in the organization of the boards, they were in operation only about two years, and during that time decided 2,152 claims. If the board of commissioners under the proposed bill could act as promptly they would dispose of all claims which have been filed within two years. Three boards organized to settle land titles within the Louisiana purchase under the acts of March 3, 1805, and March 3, 1807 (2 Stat., 324 and 440), disposed of 8,353 claims. Successive boards sitting for different periods, created by the acts of May 8, 1822 (3 Stat., 709), March 3, 1825 (4 Stat., 125), February 8, 1827 (4 Stat., 202), and May 23, 1828 (4 Stat., 284), to settle land titles in Florida, disposed of 1,739 claims. In the eight months extending from May 23, 1828, to January 20, 1829, a single board of two commissioners disposed of 379 claims. The California land grants were settled by the commission organized by the act of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat., 631); 836 claims were presented to that commission, and of these 624 were confirmed while 212 were rejected.

From these numerous precedents it is evident that no extended delays would occur through the operations of the commission proposed in this bill. While the larger grants would require the most extended investigation, the great boon of prompt settlement of 80 per cent. of all the grants would be conferred by the bill, and these grants would be those of that especially deserving class, the owners of small homestead tracts.

While the court will afford a prompt disposition of the questions of title, it will also possess the essential qualification of being well adapted to discriminate justly between the valid and invalid grants. The greater part of the business of the court will be private land grants.

Every judge, as well as the attorney for the United States, will devote more than half his time to the investigation of this one subject. In this way each will be entirely famili r with its history, with the Spanish and Mexican modes of procedure, with the forms of documents, and with the signatures of the principal officers authorized to make grants of land. They will all be experts in this class of cases. The decision of the simple, uncontested, and smaller cases can safely be intrusted to them, while their intelligent labors will be at the disposal of the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the more important, complicated, and larger cases will be appealed. The presence of the judges in New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado will give them an intimate familiarity with these grants, while the representatives of the United States attached to the court will have favorable opportunities to scrutinize all claims and witnesses.

The number of the judges, fixed by the bill at three, will afford an opportunity for consultation and discussion in appealed cases and a settlement of general principles to guide the separate action of each—means of the greatest value in reaching wise conclusions.

Parties and witnesses may be required to appear and give testimony in person before the court, and thus their credibility can be most effectually tested. Special provision is also made for obtaining Spanish and Mexican records in certain cases. It is of great advantage, too, that the presentation of claims and the rules of evidence will be uniform. Many documents relied upon as evidence of grants or as proofs of authenticity of signatures will be of general applicability. In the hands of one court these can readily be applied to any case in which they are needed. If these grants were referred to the various Territorial courts, such papers would have to be transmitted from court to court at great risk and with serious delays to litigants.

The recommendation of experience is not wanting for this legislation. All French and Spanish titles in territory acquired by the United States have been settled by special tribunals. In Mississippi, in Louisiana, in Florida, and in California similar means have been adopted, and this bill has been framed in the light of experience under these tribunals.

Successive Commissioners of the General Land Office and surveyors-general of New Mexico have recommended the creation of a special tribunal to settle these titles. Eighteen years ago the surveyor-general said (Report Commissioner General Land Office, 1870, page 418):

A commission to settle and determine these claims, and a time fixed within which to present them, seems to be the most urgent want of the land system of New Mexico.

In his annual report for 1871 the Commissioner of the General Land Office used this language (page 64):

It is most important to the growth and prosperity of those Territories to which settlement is rapidly being attracted by the extension of railroads, that a separation be made at the earliest possible period between the public lands and those claimed under foreign titles.

It is respectfully suggested that the creation by Congress of a commission similar to that instituted under the act of March 3, 1851, for California would best conduce to a speedy and just settlement of claims of this kind and promote the rapid growth of those young and enterprising Territories.

In his report for 1875 the Commissioner of the General Land Office made the following recommendation (page 45):

The remedy which I suggest for the correction of these evils is the repeal of the jurisdiction now vested in the surveyors-general and the appointment of three or more commissioners, with full power to hear and decide the validity of all grant claims within the limits of the territory acquired from Mexico, except in the State of California, and with appeal from their decision to the United States courts. By the selection of men specially qualified for and who can devote their time exclusively to these duties a more speedy and otherwise more satisfactory settlement will be obtained. It is believed that if the papers in each case be put in order and the record made up by these commissioners, more speed will be obtained than if the courts, with their other important duties, are given original jurisdiction over these claims.

In the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 1883 he thus sums up his conclusions on the subject (page 13):

My best conclusion is that a commission should be appointed for each of the Territories named, the duties of which should embrace a thorough examination and investigation of the foundations of all alleged private land claims in these Territories, together with an actual investigation of boundaries and limits; and that all claims before Congress or this office, as well as those depending before the surveyors-general, should be remanded to such commission for examination and decision, with proper appeal for review upon errors of law.

Other recommendations by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the surveyor-general of New Mexico will be found in the following reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Surveyor-general, report for 1869, page 319; 1871, page 147; 1873, page 102; 1875, page 216. The settlement of these long-unsettled titles is absolutely demanded by every interest of the Territory of New Mexico. Her development for the last forty years has been retarded by this harassing uncertainty. Thousands of acres of the public lands have been withdrawn from settlement and thousands of acres of private grants rendered unavailable for sale to actual settlers because Congress has neglected to carry out treaty stipulations. Improvements languish because no one knows what will be done with titles to land. New Mexico desires an opportunity for a free development of her great natural resources. Nothing will aid her more than the final settlement of her land titles.

The last House passed without opposition (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 17, part 5, pages 4370 to 4381) a bill designed to cure these long-existing evils. The bill now before the House is offered as a practicable solution of the question and promises a speedy settlement of the forty years' trouble and delay. The whole Territory of New Mexico awaits its passage with the utmost anxiety.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. I had not intended to submit any observations upon it until to-day, and what I may say with reference to it, being without proper preparation, will, doubtless, be somewhat fragmentary and without that regularity which I should wish.

The matters involved are of great importance, and deserve the most careful consideration by the committee and the House.

The questions presented are not new to me, for I had the honor to be a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims in the Forty-eighth Congress, and gave the subject a good deal of study, and trust I shall be able to shed a little light upon it in this discussion.

Mr. Chairman, a brief résumé of the situation, somewhat in detail, as I can glean the facts from memory and such documents as I have at hand, may not be unprofitable.

By the success of our arms in the war with Mexico we became possessed, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in 1848, of the territory now known as California, Nevada, Utah, Western Colorado, part of Arizona and New Mexico; and by the second Mexican cession—the Gadsden purchase in 1853—and the Texas cession of 1850, the remainder of Arizona and New Mexico, as we now know them.

Prior to our acquisition of this vast territory grants and dispositions of lands of greater or less areas, under the authority of the Spanish and Mexican Governments, had been made, and when we succeeded as a conquering nation to the country by the well-known rules of international law we were bound to respect the rights of property of the subjects of the conquered territory situated therein.

Moreover, by the terms of the treaty, we agreed that "Mexicans now established in Territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future in the limits of the United States as defined by this treaty shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic, retaining the property which they now possess in the said Territories, or disposing thereof, and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected, on this account, to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever."

An examination of the details of the land grants under Spain and Mexico will show that while they were frequently prodigal, extravagant in area, they were based on orders, proclamations, and decrees, more or less regular, but pursuant to system, beginning in 1773 with directions from the Spanish viceroy to the military commandant at San Diego and Monterey granting lands to individuals near the missions and pueblos; later, lots of land to soldiers who should marry baptized Indian women; lands to colonists for cultivation, for the requirements of vessels in the East Indian trade, and to furnish supplies for the garrisons of the presidios.

Later in the history the governor was empowered to authorize captains of the military posts to grant lots of land within certain distances of the presidio squares.

After the establishment of the Republic of Mexico in 1824 the system was continued, and the political chiefs of the territories were authorized to make grants in certain cases, and under certain regulations provision was made for large grants for colonization purposes.

While the country was under Spanish and Mexican control, and indeed until a very recent period, the lands were very sparsely settled and regarded as sterile and infertile, and except on the borders of the streams, where a crude system of irrigation could be inexpensively adopted, were considered as of little value except as open ranges for grazing of stock. Therefore the lands were freely granted in large areas to those desirous of establishing ranches or colonies, and along the streams and in the neighborhood of the presidios or garrisons, in narrow lots on the water front, running back to the highlands. To this class I shall refer later.

As a rule none of these grants were surveyed under the former governments; the descriptions were generally vague and indefinite, and usually by reference to other grants equally indefinite, water-courses, mountain ranges, etc. So they come to us, and the difficulty has been to adopt some plan by which the rights of bona fide holders of these foreign titles should be protected in their rights and at the same time the Government shielded from robbery through fictitious claims either of title or boundary, for it is a matter well known to all who have been called upon to deal with this interesting subject that the modern manufacture of ancient muniments of title to these lands is an industry of no small magnitude. As to them, Mr. Chairman, the frauds are infinite in variety and detail, almost, and limited as to areas only by the amount which may be claimed.

The earlier method of settling these claims of titles was by commission, beginning under the treaty with Great Britain, September 3, 1783, down to the settlement of California titles under the act of 1851.

Still later, the act of 1854, so frequently referred to in this debate, was passed, and is the only existing law relating to the claims we are now considering. That act, in brief, authorizes the surveyor-general to ascertain the origin, nature, and extent of all claims originating before the treaty, with his decision on the same, and to report the same to the Secretary of the Interior, to be by him laid before Congress for its action; and until Congress shall act, the grant as surveyed and reported on by the surveyor-general shall be reserved from sale or other disposal by the Government.

It will be noticed, Mr. Chairman, that there is no decision or determination of any question under this act until Congress shall itself make the ultimate decision; and so often has Congress been imposed on by fraudulent titles, and a consequent hesitancy to act in pending cases, with the great mass of business it has to dispose of as well, these claims, so far as reported by the surveyor-general, remain unacted upon and unsettled.

Of course, this state of uncertainty and delay as to title to large areas of real estate seriously affect the prosperity of the Territories, and it goes without saying that some remedy should be provided which will tend to a settlement of the difficulty as speedily as may be, and yet not endanger the rights of the Government by permitting approval of fraudulent, fictitious titles.

My investigation of the subject, Mr. Chairman, has led me to conclude long ago that the best system, the one least expensive to the Government—indeed, comparatively inexpensive—which would be speedy in accomplishing results and protective to the Government, would be substantially this: To give the Department of the Interior jurisdiction to hear and determine all these cases, with a right to either party aggrieved to an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and in substance to provide that the surveyor-general should proceed as now to investigate fully, with additional assistance, if deemed advisable, to expedite the business, and for open and public hearings, and on this to report to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who should, if deemed advisable, order further investigation, and then, after a fair hearing, he to decide the case. An appeal to be allowed to the Secretary of the Interior, or in case no appeal is taken, the case to be certified to the Secretary for trial on the appeal, or examination and approval by him if no appeal is presented, and decision by him. By this all the records will be in his office, and readily accessible. From his decision, if desired, an appeal to the Supreme Court.

These provisions should apply, as I think, to all cases involving 11 square leagues or less, that being claimed to be the maximum amount allowed under the Mexican law to an individual. If the grant is claimed for more than that amount it should go to Congress for confirmation. Holders of small tracts by possession, less than 160 acres in area, for twenty years or more, by occupants or ancestors, should have their holdings ascertained, surveyed, and patented to them without cost, through the surveyor-general, or his force, and till that is done all applications to enter land in these localities should show and full proof be made that no part of the lands sought to be entered is in possession of a person of Spanish or Mexican descent.

There should be a limitation of say two years within which all claims should be presented, and in all cases the written evidences of title, or copies thereof, should be filed with the claim, and also in every county where the land lies, and no paper received in evidence unless so filed and recorded in the real-estate records.

Abolish the system of survey and withdrawal on it, and provide that the recording shall be notice.

This in substance, sir, has been my idea for the settlement of these claims for years, and what I shall say will be in support of that plan and so against the pending bill.

I am opposed on principle to the establishment of special, subordinate, inferior tribunals, with limited jurisdiction, for special purposes, only dignifying them by the title of "courts," and with all the expense attending them, especially when the same results sought can be attained by existing machinery with no added expense.

This bill will require about $30,000 to $35,000 per year to run it, and, as I shall show, increase the list of office-holders without any necessary demand.

But before reaching that, the plans proposed, as noticed thus far in the debate, are, outside of the pending bill, only two: a commission, such as was formerly had, and an enlargement of the jurisdiction of the existing courts. The last named has never met with approval by either House, although often considered by members, and the experience with commissions has not been satisfactory, indeed is subject to the gravest objections.

Before proceeding with my argument I wish to say, now and here, Mr. Chairman, that Congress has not been inactive in attempting to provide some means for the settlement of these private land claims, made by Spain and Mexico before we acquired the territory, during all these years. For since I have been a member of this body, for the past eight years, there has always been, in one House or the other, some scheme or plan which was regarded as an improvement upon the existing conditions and the existing law for the settlement of the vexed question of claims for lands in the Territories named in this bill. There have been plans proposed at the other end of the Capitol for the organization of a court by what is known as the Edmunds bill. It is an old measure. When I first came to Congress bills for the establishment of local courts were pending in this House, and have been pending in it ever since I have been a member. Other plans have been proposed, but none of them have met the concurrent approval of the Senate and the House so as to change the plan provided by the act of 1854.

With reference to the presentation of this bill, I may be permitted to express my surprise that neither in the report on the bill nor in any of the speeches thus far made has any reference been made to the easy plan I have outlined. One would think from what has been said that the choice necessarily lay between a court or a commission and no third plan worthy of notice.

Let me suggest, also, Mr. Chairman, what struck me as surprising, that the committee deemed it beneath its dignity to ask the opinion of the Department of the Interior as to what might be proper legislation with reference to this subject. It has not yet been stated, at least within my hearing, that the Department of the Interior has had settled, and, as I believe, correct, views with reference to the settlement of this question, and that those views have been expressed more than once, officially, by the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and, Mr. Chairman, no Secretary of the Interior, no Commissioner of the General Land Office, has ever approved the plan which is outlined by the bill we are now considering. But on the other hand, recognizing the gravity of the situation, and the necessity of some change of existing law, and the propriety of having some other plan by which the uncertainty that taints these titles may be speedily swept from the domain of doubt and be settled, they have made recommendations year after year which have not, up to this time, been deemed worthy of comment by any of the gentlemen who have had the attention of the committee.

The importance of the questions has been repeatedly pressed upon the attention of the late Secretary, and as frequently as he has had opportunity he has expressed his views. What does the Secretary of the Interior recommend? I can state it better by reading a few sentences from his official report than by undertaking to adapt my language to give expression to his idea.

PRIVATE GRANTS.

"Another subject which I would respectfully suggest demands immediate legislation is the matter of private grants claimed to be derived from the Spanish or Mexican Governments. This legislation, in my opinion, should be directed to two points: (1) to providing for a trial and final determination of such claims, subject only to appeal to the Supreme Court; (2) an act of limitations barring the presentation of new claims of this character within a stated period.

"By section 8 of the act of July 22, 1864 (10 Stats., 308), it is made the duty of the surveyor-general of New Mexico to "ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico." He is to make report of all such claims with his decision as to the validity or the invalidity of the same, which report shall be laid before Congress for action, and until final action of Congress on such claims all lands covered thereby shall be reserved from sale or other disposal by the Government. Under the provisions of this law, from time to time since its passage, many claims have been made and acted upon, whilst a number are yet pending before Congress unacted upon. The extent and number of the unconfirmed claims can not be accurately stated, as such claims are being continually made, and those heretofore presented seem to grow enormously in area with each passing year in the issuance of patents thereon. At the present time it is approximately estimated that the amount of public land actually reserved from entry and settlement because of such claims is a little short of 6,000,000 acres. Most of this land has been thus reserved for many years, used, enjoyed, or transferred, and sold as freely by the pretended claimants as though their title had been fully confirmed.

"In regard to the lands under Mexican or Spanish title thus held in reservation, this Department is powerless to act, as such reservations are established by act of Congress, and must continue perpetually until that body acts. The well-known fact that by means of such a claim possession can be readily obtained and retained of large bodies of land has very much to do with their continued increase. The claimant has but to pass the ordeal of the surveyor-general's office, where the examination is ex parte, often perfunctory, superficial, and possibly erroneous. A favorable report being obtained the law steps in, ousts the jurisdiction of the Land Department from the claimed territory, segregates it from the public domain, and the claimant under this most shadowy and often colorless pretense of title is installed and protected in the enjoyment of all he claims as fully as though possessed of an absolute right and title.

"Millions of acres of public lands are thus held by claimants, and have been held for many years, in some instances for more than thirty years, and in most instances the lands thus held are the best for many miles around. The claimant, being thus guarded and protected in his enjoyment until Congress acts, has no motive to follow up further action by Congress, after the report of the surveyor-general has been transmitted to that body, for whilst the report sleeps in the committee-room his possession and enjoyment of this vast estate remains undisturbed. I need not go further to show the inducements thus held out to the presentation of false claims resting on foundations so shadowy that under other circumstances no one would be tempted to rely upon them. And hence to-day, thirty-three years after the passage of the act, as is shown by the report from the General Land Office, there is but little abatement in either the number or extent of the claims being presented to the land officers.

"The surveyor-general of New Mexico states that during the past year examination has been made of a number of new claims and of old claims (heretofore favorably reported) yet pending before Congress unconfirmed, the area of which aggregates by estimation 4,000,000 of acres; whilst he thinks 200,000 acres will cover all legal and equitable rights thereunder. Nearly forty years have elapsed since the United States has assumed a solemn treaty obligation to perfect and confirm rights existing under these claims.

"As to what action is best to be taken in the premises, opinions differ, but that some action should be taken, and speedily taken, all who know anything about the subject agree. I confess the subject is somewhat difficult to agree with, but after the best consideration I am able to give it, together with my experience in relation to these private land claims, I am now of the opinion that the most desirable and effective manner of disposing of them would be through the Land Department. Provision should be made for an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, whose decision should be final, unless an appeal be taken directly therefrom to the Supreme Court of the United States.

"As at present organized and equipped, with a slight increase of force, this Department is fully equal to dealing with and determining all legal questions arising under these grants. It has at its disposal legal talent, trained and familiar with questions of land law and in the habit of acting judicially in other cases. Representing the executive power of the Government, this Department must in any event be a large participant in any action in relation to these grants. The official documents, the archives, ancient and modern, relating to the public lands and foreign grants, are in its custody and must there remain. Even were laws enacted transferring entire jurisdiction in relation to these foreign grants to the courts, it would be almost impossible entirely to separate the private lands from the public land system without the interposition of this Department. In fact, now, where grants are confirmed by Congress, this Department has to supervise the surveys in order to carry them into patent.

"Under any plan suggested this Department must be an important factor in administering the law as to these grants; it would therefore seem to be the part of wisdom to confer upon it sufficient jurisdiction and power to fully adjudicate and adjust them, thus dispensing with the unnecessary operations of two machines, neither of which is complete in itself or capable of perfecting the work. The agents and officers of the Department visit or are located in every section where such claims may arise. If clothed with proper authority, the parol testimony desired could be taken before them; though in view of the lapse of time very little testimony except that of record would be presented. That testimony is already on file among our records. Provision should be made for serving process and making the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office final, unless appeal be taken to the Secretary, and the decision of the latter officer final, subject to appeal, as before stated, to the Supreme Court of the United States. Such a plan, in my opinion, would be simple, inexpensive, and accomplish the settlement of these claims in a much more expeditious and satisfactory manner than any of those heretofore suggested.

"When a member of the Senate I favored the idea that the ordinary judicial tribunals of the country were best adapted to deal with the subject, as in other cases where the same rights are at stake, and more in accord with the spirit of our institutions; and, further, because whatever legislation may be enacted or executive action taken, sooner or later each and every grant finds its way into the courts and in some way receives a judicial construction. A larger experience has, however, brought me to realize the force of the objection urged in the reports of the surveyor-general of New Mexico, that the right of the National Government to lands can not be wisely left to the arbitrament of local tribunals, which are more or less under local influences and supposed to sympathize with the individual claimant as against the Government, and to be inclined to deal with his pretensions in a spirit of undue liberality without due regard to legal rights. That experience has shown that the subordinate officers of the Government who are charged with the protection of its interests at remote points become easy prey to the same influences, and the trial of such cases almost invariably degenerates into an ex parte hearing wherein the claimant is allowed and expected to make out his side of the case, if in his power, without opposition or resistance or a due regard to the rights of the defense. Further, it is stated that the dockets of the local courts in the Territories are already overburdened with causes which the judges find themselves utterly unable to dispose of as expeditiously as the proper administration of justice demands. Such cases would almost invariably be carried up to the United States Supreme Court, certainly as often as they would be if decided by the Department."

The indorsement of the plan I have outlined was given by the ex-Secretary in his report for the preceding year, and earnestly recommended by the surveyors-general of New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. SYMES. If this Department is so well equipped with gentlemen learned in the law that it only needs an additional inspector and auditor or two to carry out the object of settling all these private land claims, why is it that after having been at it for thirty-four years they have accomplished practically nothing?

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I am utterly surprised that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] should ask that question, because it demonstrates (and I say it in the most respectful spirit to the gentleman from Colorado) his entire ignorance of the subject-matter that we are discussing. If he had read even cursorily, if he had read even once, the act of 1854, he would know that the Department of the Interior has no power to do other with reference to these claims than to report them to Congress. The Secretary may recommend to Congress to reject them if, in his judgment, they ought to be rejected, and so report them to Congress; but that is the extent of his power. Nothing can be decided under the act of 1854, except by Congress, and that is the defect of that act, that these officers can only report to Congress; they can not determine anything, and because they can not decide, and Congress will not, nothing is accomplished.

Am I understood?

Mr. SYMES. Certainly.

Mr. PAYSON. And there have been reports after reports of these cases, the dockets of this House are burdened with them—reports of rejected claims, passed upon as far as they could be passed upon by the Department of the Interior; but under existing law, as I have said, there is no determination of these claims until these reports come to Congress and are acted upon. And why has not that been done? This brings me to the consideration of the necessity of careful legislation with reference to this matter. The frauds which have been perpetrated under the law allowing private grants to be recognized are, as I have said, infinite in number and infinite in variety, but they have been circumscribed only by the area of the lands over which they could be floated. I have under my hand, and I regret that I have not the time to read them, reports showing millions and millions of acres of the public lands which have been claimed in this way, and which, by the vigilance of the officers who are denounced in no feeble terms by gentlemen upon this floor, have been saved to the people of this country.

Mr. SYMES. And I say——

Mr. PAYSON. I beg the gentleman not to interrupt me unless by addressing the Chair. Mr. Chairman, I have always followed the custom, and I shall not depart from it now, of yielding for a question to any gentleman who desires to ask it for information. I do not assume any pride of opinion in what I state here. It is simply my statement of what I believe, and I shall be happy to answer any question which may be asked me, giving my ideas to the gentleman and the committee, but I must beg the gentleman not to anticipate me or interrupt in the midst of a sentence.

But I have the figures and the reports of cases here under my hand, and I will insert them later, showing what has been done in the Interior Department in saving these lands for the people of this country as against the claims of public plunderers, the equals of whom have never been seen in the civilized world, and these lands have been saved for the people by the efforts of the men whom the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] denounces here as special agents and twelve-hundred-dollar clerks in the General Land Office.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYSON. With pleasure.

Mr. SYMES. The gentleman in reply to my question a while ago intimates that I am not familiar with this law. I do not wish to discuss that question, but the very statement he has made confirms what I have said——

Mr. PAYSON. I am yielding for a question.

Mr. SYMES. The gentleman's own statement confirms what I said a while ago, namely, that it was impracticable to get these honest claims through Congress, and that claims have gone through here, and patents have been issued to claimants for millions of acres more than they ought to have had.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, what is the gentleman's question? [Laughter.]

Mr. SYMES. If the Interior Department is so effieient, why have they not reported the cases to Congress?

Mr. PAYSON. They have been reported on, nearly all of them, and I have a list of them here which I will not stop to read, but insert. The report of the Commissioner shows that there have been confirmed by Congress claims aggregating 9,668,468 acres; that there are pending in Congress for action by it 123 claims covering 9,349,433 acres, as claimed. These are the lists:

†Can not be estimated.

Those marked * are reported and recommended for rejection; except in a very few cases a small area is allowed. These claims have all been reported to Congress, and it may be as well here as anywhere to notice, Mr. Chairman, what the reports are with reference to some of them.

I have not been able to go through the list, but these are abstracts of the reports as to a large proportion of those pending here, and typical of them all as a class; and, as will be seen, a large proportion are reported for rejection because of a condition shown by these abstracts.

Arroyo de San Lorenzo, No. 79, New Mexico. Area claimed, 130,000 acres.

This is an individual grant claimed to have been made in 1825, and accordingly subject to the Mexican law of 1824, which limited grants of that character to one "sitio de gañado menor," or 1,813.32 acres. There was no evidence in this office of the authenticity of the documents upon which the claim of original grant was based, and none that the conditions upon which such grants were made had been complied with by the grantee to an extent that would vest in him any property rights in the land under the laws of Mexico at date of transfer of jurisdiction, and the proceedings before the surveyor-general were, as usual, wholly ex parte. The claim now presented to Congress is for a quantity more than seventy times greater than that called for by the alleged original grant.

No. 49.—Bernabi M. Montano et al. Preliminary survey, 151,056.90 acres; area granted to 12 persons, 7 square leagues, or about 31,000 acres. Grant to this extent believed to be valid. Recommended for confirmation, to the extent of 7 square leagues, to the heirs and legal representatives of the 12 original grantees.

No. 50.—Antonio Sedillo; Cañada de los Apaches. Preliminary survey in 1877 for 88,079.78 acres. Claim recommended for rejection for want of compliance with conditions of grant. Preliminary survey pronounced fraudulent as to location and quantity, if grant were valid.

No. 51.—Ojo del Medio; Francisco Chaves, present claimant. Area claimed, 3,546.06 acres. Claimant fails to connect himself with the alleged grant. No valid grant made. No evidence that original claimed grantees ever occupied or in any way reduced to possession the tract claimed under the invalid grant. Claim recommended for rejection.

No. 55.—Encinas; José Luis Valdez et al., claimants. Area claimed, 6,583.29 acres. Alleged boundaries too vague and indefinite to be located on the earth's surface. No evidence of grant. Recommended for rejection.

No. 62.—Town of Cieneguilla. Preliminary survey in 1877, 43,961.54 acres. No legal title shown, but equitable claim recognized from long possession. Actual area to be ascertained (town grants limited to 4 square leagues).

No. 66.—San Joaquin del Nacimiento; Joaquin de Luna, claimant. Preliminary survey, 131,725.87 acres. No evidence that present claimants are heirs or legal representatives of alleged grantees, nor that the land claimed is covered by the grant. Grant invalid for want of compliance with conditions prescribed. Preliminary survey clearly erroneous. "If any valid grant had been shown, under any view of the facts of the case that can be at all justified, the claim made is indefensible." Recommended for rejection.

No. 67.—San Clemente; Aña de Sandoval y Manzanares, claimant. Preliminary survey, 89,403.40 acres. No right or title shown in present claimants. Their averment of ownership wholly unsupported. Original grantee failed to comply with conditions of grant. The lands are occupied by some thousands of inhabitants whose rights, by long occupancy, or under the laws of the United States, would be sacrificed if this claim were confirmed. Claim recommended for rejection.

No. 68.—Luis de Armenta. Area claimed, 475 acres. Preliminary survey in 1879, 444.24 acres. Area granted, 8.82 acres. Confirmation recommended for amount granted.

No. 70.—Estancia; Antonio Sandoval et al. Preliminary survey, 415,036.56 acres. None of the proceedings necessary to make a valid preliminary concession were had in this case. The alleged preliminary concession was not approved by the Mexican Government. There was no authority for the alleged grant, which was never perfected, and there is no record of it. No right or title to the lands claimed was vested in the purported grantee, and his rights under the land laws of Mexico had been exhausted by a prior grant. Claim recommended for rejection.

No. 71.—Cañon de Chama; Francisco Salazar et al. Area estimated by original petitioners for confirmation, 184,320 acres. Preliminary survey in 1878 at instance of present claimants, 472,736.95 acres. Actual extent of grant, as recommended by alcalde, 4 square leagues, or 17,361.04 acres. Actual possession, 166.22 acres, given to thirty-five persons with common rights in the remainder of the 4 square leagues. Recommended for confirmation to the heirs and legal representatives of the thirty-five original grantees to the extent of 4 square leagues.

No. 75.—Sierra Masca; Juan Luis Ortiz. Area claimed, 115,200 acres. Preliminary survey in 1879, 33,250.39 acres. Claim a forgery. Recommended for rejection.

No. 76.—Town of San Antonio del Rio Colorado. Preliminary survey, 18,955.22 acres. Recommended for confirmation by surveyor-general in 1874, "to the inhabitants of the village." The present surveyor-general finds no legal title, but as the inhabitants were placed in possession by an officer of the Mexican Government, and have occupied, improved, and cultivated the land in good faith for more than thirty years, he recommends confirmation upon equitable grounds to the extent of lands actually occupied and improved under the proceedings by which they were placed in possession and within the boundaries therein specified, the quantity and precise location to be hereafter determined by evidence and a survey in the field.

No. 79.—Arroyo de San Lorenzo; Antonio Chaves. Preliminary survey in 1878, 130,138.98 acres. No evidence that grantee complied with the conditions of the laws under which the grant was made. Recommended for rejection.

No. 87.—Gaspar Ortiz. Preliminary survey, 42,000 acres. Claimed area unknown. Papers forgeries. Recommended for rejection.

No. 91.—Town of Alameda; representatives of Francisco Montez Vigil, claimants. Preliminary survey in 1878, 106,274.87 acres. No evidence that grantee ever entered into actual possession of the lands or complied with the conditions of the grant. The land claimed has notoriously been occupied by large numbers of people in villages and on ranches for many years, and was so occupied long before the American occupation of the country. A confirmation to grant claimants would dispossess these people of their valid rights under the laws of the United States, and give their homes and possessions to strangers who have no legal or equitable claim to the land. The Vigil claim is recommended for rejection.

No. 93.—Cañon del Rio Colorado; Antonio Elias Armenta et al., claimed grantees. Area claimed, 42,939.21 acres. Claim rests upon a pretended preliminary concession by the town council, which, if made, was without authority under the Mexican laws and was never perfected into a grant under those laws. Claimants never entered into possession, and have failed to show either a legal or equitable claim. The party now claiming has failed to connect himself with the claim. There is nothing to show that original petitioners for preliminary concession are dead or alive, or that they left any legal representatives. The claim can not be located on the earth's surface under the terms of the petition and alleged concession. The lands claimed were occupied and cultivated by others previous and subsequent to the date of the pretended concession. Claim recommended for rejection.

No. 96.—Ignacio Chaves et al. Petitioners for grant asked for a tract one league and a half square, or 9,755 English acres. Ceremonial possession was given for a tract containing 4 square leagues and somewhat more, 4 square leagues being 17,360 acres. A preliminary survey of alleged boundaries was made in 1878, covering 243,036.43 acres, or more than ten times the quantity preliminarily granted. The grant was conditioned upon occupation and use, and there is no evidence that these conditions were in any manner complied with, or that grantees had any actual property interest in the land at date of cession to the United States. Claim recommended for rejection.

No. 99.—Nuestra Señora del Pilar; Diego Antonio Chaves et al. Preliminary survey, 22,578.12 acres. Quantity claimed largely in excess of alleged grant. Present claimants have failed to connect themselves in any manner with alleged grantees, and the evidence adduced fails to show either a legal title or equitable claim under said grant to any portion of the lands claimed. Recommended for rejection.

No. 103.—Luis Jaramillo, or Agua Salada. The preliminary concession is believed to be genuine and is for 1 square league. A survey made in 1879, in the interest of grant claimants, covers 18,046.59 acres, or more than 4 square leagues. There is no evidence that the express conditions of the grant were complied with, and present claimants are not identified as having any connection with original grantees; neither is there any evidence that grantees ever occupied the land or that they left any heirs or legal representatives. The surveyor-general states that no valid title, legal or equitable, is shown to the lands claimed, and the survey would be fraudulent if the grant were valid. Claim recommended for rejection.

No. 105.—Petaca; José Julian Martinez et al. Preliminary survey, 186,977.11 acres. The original concession was to thirty-six persons for a town grant. Such grants were limited to 4 square leagues. The grant in this case never became perfected into record title. The town of Petaca, containing about thirty families, is situated upon the land, and was in existence at date of transfer of jurisdiction. The survey is grossly excessive in quantity. Confirmation recommended on equitable grounds to the heirs and legal representatives of the thirty-six original grantees to the extent of the land actually occupied and cultivated by them.

No. 106.—Ojo de la Cabra; Juan Otero, original claimant. Area, 4,340.26 acres. Rejection recommended on ground that claimants have failed to show a title either in law or equity.

No. 107.—Town of Socorro. Claimed estimated area, 1,612,000 acres. Preliminary survey in 1878, 843,259.59 acres. No valid grant of record, but there were undoubtedly many inhabitants upon the lands prior to the treaty of 1848. The amount of land that could rightfully be claimed, would be small, as the towns upon it which contained the population formed a small group included in a few square leagues. Confirmation is recommended upon equitable grounds to the original settlers, their descendants and legal representatives, for the land actually occupied and used by them on the 2d day of February, 1848, its extent to be hereafter ascertained by evidence and a survey upon the ground, excluding mineral lands.

No. 108.—Vallecito de Lovato; José Rafael Zanora et al., claimed grantees. Preliminary surveys in 1878, 114,400.54 acres. Area claimed by present claimants, 30,000 acres. Claim recommended for rejection, on the ground that no legal or equitable claim has been shown.

No. 111.—Santa Teresa; Francisco Garcia et al. Preliminary survey, 9,681.29 acres. The preliminary concession in this case was not perfected into grant at the date of the Gadsden treaty, and being for lands ceded by that treaty, is void under the provisions of the sixth article thereof. Rejection recommended.

No. 115.—Cieneguilla; Francisco de Anaya Alamazer. Grant alleged for a quantity of land amounting to 1,666⅔ varas, or about 500 acres. Preliminary survey, made in 1879, covers 45,244.73 acres. The surveyor-general reports no valid grant, but recommends an equitable confirmation to the extent of about 500 acres, which is shown to have been in the possession of the representatives of the alleged grantee.

No. 119.—San Miguel del Bado; Lorenzo Marquez et al. Preliminary survey, 315,300.80 acres. The grant was made to fifty-two persons whose names are specified, and distribution was made in the act of juridical possession among fifty-eight heads of families. The surveyor-general finds the grant valid and recommends confirmation to the heirs and legal representatives of the persons named in the distribution. In reference to quantity, he states that it was not the practice of the Spanish Government to make grants of large tracts of land at the date of this concession. I find upon examining the allotments that the whole area to which title was given to the fifty-eight persons was 61 acres, being a house and garden lot for each. The cultivable and grazing lands were common. I have recommended confirmation to the extent only of the land reduced by grantees to their actual use and occupancy to be ascertained by additional evidence and survey.

No. 126.—Bartolome Baca. No survey has been made by the United States, and it is impracticable to estimate the area, as the boundaries can not be identified from official records.

The surveyor-general disapproves the claim, for the reason that claimants have failed to show either a legal title or an equitable claim.

No. 128.—Las Truchas; Francisco Montes Vigil. The grant was for a tract to be measured in a specified manner, and so measured would contain one square league, or 4,340.28 acres. Mineral lands expressly reserved. The preliminary survey covers 10,314.65 acres, evidently an excess of nearly 6,000 acres. There is nothing to show positively that grantees earned the land by complying with the conditions of the grant.

No. 132.—Antonio de Salazar et al. Preliminary survey, 23,351.12 acres. No title, but an equitable claim to a small portion of an area of 2,900 acres, mostly absorbed by the patented Indian pueblos of San Juan.

No. 137.—Sebastian de Vargas. Area estimated by claimants, 24,000 acres. Surveyor-General Pullen, in 1884, disapproves the claim, on the ground that claimants have not presented a prima facie case. Surveyor-General Julian recognizes an equitable claim to the extent of lands actually occupied and cultivated, to be determined by additional evidence and survey.

No. 138.—Pueblo of Santa Clara. Area unknown. Grant regarded valid, and confirmation recommended to the Indian or native inhabitants.

ORIGINAL EXAMINATIONS.

No. 140.—Town of Abiquiu. Estimated area, 10,980 acres. Confirmation recommended not to exceed that amount.

No. 141.—Domingo Valdez. Claimed area unknown. Claim recommended for rejection on the ground that claimants have failed to prove a legal title or equitable claim.

No. 142.—Pueblos, of Santo Domingo and San Felipe. Area unknown. Pueblo grants limited to 4 square leagues. Confirmation recommended.

No. 143.—Ocate. Claimed area unknown. Grantees failed to comply with conditions, and claim void for uncertainty of description. Rejection recommended.

No. 144.—Los Huertas. Claimed area unknown. No evidences that grant was ever made. Claim recommended for rejection.

No. 147.—José Antonio Lucero. Grant to the extent of 1 fanega of corn planting, or 8.82 acres. Regarded valid, and recommended for confirmation to that extent.

No. 148.—Plaza Blanca. Estimated area about 14,000 acres. Grant made for a fanega and a half of corn planting, or 13.23 acres. The larger area has been occupied for cultivation of grazing. The surveyor-general regards the grant as valid, and recommends confirmation. I have suggested that confirmation be limited to the extent of land actually granted.

No. 152.—Guadaloupita. Claimed area unknown. No evidences of grant. Claim recommended for rejection.

The grants and alleged grants embraced in the foregoing examinations and re-examinations include an ascertained claimed area of some 3,600,000 acres, with an unascertained area sufficient to swell the amount to upwards of 4,000,000 acres. In this amount the surveyor-general finds valid claims to the extent of some 100,000 acres of ascertained area, and there is possibly an equal amount embraced in his recommendations for an equitable confirmation of certain unascertained small areas. Not less than 90 per cent. of the area embraced in grants heretofore reported for confirmation are found by these examinations to be made up of invalid claims and fraudulent surveys.

In empowering surveyors-general to examine and report upon private land claims Congress failed to provide any means whatever for an investigation upon their merits, and the reports originally made are, therefore, in gross, merely reports of claimants' representations unchallenged, unverified, and uninvestigated. So-called preliminary surveys, made wholly at the instance of claimants, represent merely the greed of insatiable demands, and are no guide to either the location or extent of actual grants.

With this light before it Congress has hesitated, and members who have investigated these claims have felt assured that nine out of ten were as fraudulent and as false as perjury could make them. Nine out of ten of the claims that have been presented have been supported by manufactured titles. I speak advisedly when I say nine out of ten, for I have in my hands now the reports of the surveyors-general of New Mexico and of Arizona, and they both make that statement.

And, more than that, there have been many of these grants confirmed in the earlier days of Congress but none now; but why? I am glad to tell the gentleman. Because it has been only within a very recent period that the Congress of the United States has opened its eyes to the fact that the public lands of this nation were rapidly slipping away from the grasp of the General Government. Within my recollection—since I came into business life—the great West was thought to be illimitable. When I went to the State of Illinois people thought that the public land was inexhaustible. Whenever a corporation came to Congress asking for land the grant was made to it, limited only by the modesty of the request. The records of Congress will show that upwards of 200,000,000 acres of public land were given prodigally and lavishly to those who simply came and asked for them. It startles the mind to realize the extravagance and prodigality with which these grants were made, simply for the asking. I am not criticising now the men who did it. I would not have done it if I had been here; but it is done, and has gone into the domain of history.

The point I make now is that the public land was regarded as inexhaustible, and whoever came here making any kind of a specious claim or plausible request and holding out his hopper, had that hopper filled. Who does not know it? Thus there happened with reference to various claims coming before Congress what happened as many gentlemen believe in regard to the Maxwell claim from the gentleman's own State. Many persons believe, and I am one of the number, that legally not exceeding 98,000 acres were ever embraced in that claim originally. But it was enlarged to an area of 1,700,000 acres; and extended and enlarged surveys were made from mountain peak to mountain peak, instead of from foot-hill to foot-hill. And that grant was confirmed by Congress upon the demand of gentlemen who, honestly without doubt, believed at the time that those grantees were entitled to that land.

Looking back, however, now over our history, we find that the time has come when there must be a stop put to this kind of disposition of the public lands. About 1880 there was a halt called with reference to this policy of confirming because of the reports coming up such as that which I hold in my hand from surveyors-general here and there who had investigated these matters and who found that the experience which the General Government had in dealing with land claims in California was being repeated in Arizona, New Mexico, and Colorado. Who that has had occasion to examine the workings of the commission under the act of 1854 does not remember the condition of things about the city of San Francisco about the time Mr. Edwin M. Stanton, afterward Secretary of War, was sent out there as special agent to investigate these land frauds? What did he find about your city [addressing Mr. MORROW]? The fact is familiar to you that he found titles manufactured from the first line to the last; titles on which the great wax seals, three inches in diameter, were forged; proofs made that the original records had been destroyed and that these were duly authenticated copies, and later the fact developed that there never were records. Millions of acres of land, worth now hundreds of millions of dollars, were claimed under forged titles of that sort. Those things became well understood. The air was filled with them about this Capitol when I came here in 1880; and I agree that I absorbed at that time some of the spirit of suspicion in reference to these land claims. Hence, being placed on the Private Lands Committee in the Forty-eighth Congress, I took occasion to examine some of these claims, and I believe, from personal inspection of many of them, that the statements made by the surveyors-general of Arizona and New Mexico are absolutely true. And since that time, thank God and the honesty of an American Congress, not one of those grants has ever passed this House, and I predict that none ever will. [Applause.]

Mr. SYMES. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, in his opinion, a court of justice organized as proposed by this bill, with the right of appeal in important cases to the Supreme Court of the United States, would or would not be more liable to eliminate fraud than the process which has been going on under the act of 1854?

Mr. PAYSON. I will, at a later stage of my remarks, show why I think this bill ill-advised. I am now endeavoring to state the reasons why something ought to be done. I agree with everybody who has spoken here that the act of 1854 is not working out the results which ought to be obtained by the legislation of an American Congress. But I am going to put my observations with reference to that upon a somewhat different ground from that suggested by other gentlemen.

Mr. Chairman, the rights of the claimants of these great, immense grants of public land do not trouble me in the least. I have never seen the time when a man having an immense claim either to public land or any other matter of right was not able to look after his own interests. I am opposing this bill on the threshold because it does not, in my judgment, provide for the protection of those who most need protection—the holders of small areas of land, especially in New Mexico; there are not so many of them in Arizona. The gentleman from Colorado—and I beg him to understand that when I refer to him so frequently it is not because I am singling him out as against others to be answered, but because in his discussion of the bill, unlike the remarks of other gentlemen, he has addressed himself to specific sections of it—the gentleman from Colorado says he "is thoroughly satisfied with the provisions of this bill with reference to the holders of these small grants."

I am not satisfied with them. The measure as to them, in my judgment, is wrong in principle and vicious in its enunciations. What class of people are intended to be benefited and protected by the provisions to which the gentleman has alluded and with which he says he is satisfied? How many gentlemen in this House have examined the situation of affairs in these two Territories and the relations which the people there bear to the General Government of the United States, so as to be able to vote understandingly on this question? Here is the exact situation. That country in the early days, we all know, belonged to Spain. With the extension of her boundaries and the establishment of military posts for the protection of her boundaries, military posts were established along the Rio Grande River and still farther to the north and west. Under the Spanish laws, power was given to the commandants of the different posts to farm out, as it were, to the people little pieces of land, upon which they might go and raise garden truck or vegetables and things of that kind. These were the usual camp and garrison followers, of whom we knew something in recent days, and these people settled down upon these small tracts of land granted by the commandants of the military posts. In that country crops are only raised by irrigation, and pieces of land are specially desirable only when they front upon the water. So, bordering upon the streams, and first along the Rio Grande River, these holdings with fronts sometimes as narrow as 50 feet and yet running back to the mesa or back to the mountains, these holdings were settled upon by these people.

I saw five years ago, when I went leisurely along that valley, settlements south of Albuquerque, where I was told there were 10,000 people living. Upon these little holdings they and their ancestors have been living for one hundred or two hundred years, running back to the Spanish conquest of what is now a portion of this Union. These poeple lived there. Their descendants followed after them. We agreed when we acquired possession of that territory by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to protect them in their holdings, and that whatever rights they had should be given to them without cost or expense.

Let anybody go among that people and tell them there is a question about their title to the land upon which they live, and you might as well deny the divinity of the Savior as to deny the title they have and claim by occupancy alone.

Mr. SYMES. That is the object of this bill.

Mr. PAYSON. If the gentleman will not anticipate me, I will come down to the point he has been trying to make.

Mr. SYMES. They have been trying to do that for thirty-five years, and have not yet succeeded.

Mr. PAYSON. We have not been at it within the last thirty-five years, and we have not been at it a minute in reference to this class of people. There has never been action by any surveyor-general in reference to any one of these small holdings or looking to validating that holding.

Mr. SYMES. That is what I say, and yet we have been running along for thirty-five years without having done anything.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, if the gentleman from Colorado will not anticipate me he will get at what I mean before I get through, whether he agrees with it or not. I have said to him that the Department was powerless to confirm title, and that was the defect of existing law, which my plan will rectify. I hope he understands me exactly.

Those people, Mr. Chairman, believe with the earnestness of a religious conviction that the title they have to these little holdings is absolute and indefeasible. They are harmless, quiet, and inoffensive people; innocent and ignorant; and this bill, what does it propose to do with them? Why is it brought to the attention of the law-makers there is necessity to do something for this class of people? The avarice of the American frontiersman, the man who goes out to gather in pieces of new land, is proverbial now; to the desire on the part of those who want to speculate in public lands these people open a fruitful field.

Here are people ignorant of their rights, except they have a holding which they believe to be secure without paper evidence of title, land becoming rapidly valuable in the market. There is the field for the cupidity of those going out to make claims under the general land law. So some enterprising citizen locates on a portion of land occupied by these people and enters that land in the local land office, and it goes into the General Land Office. This practice progressed so far we know that in 1879 an act of Congress was passed reserving from the public land certain valleys in Arizona and certain lands in New Mexico from the operation of the homestead and pre-emption laws in order to protect these people upon their holdings until something could be done for them.

The treaty made by the United States guaranties to them their title without cost to them. What does this bill propose? They are to present a formal petition to the court setting up their claim; the tenure under which it is held, and the evidence in support of it, the extent and boundaries of it, to be known only after expensive surveys; then, if after investigation they have been found in possession of it for forty years, the court may confirm their title to that land! They ask for bread and are given a stone! And then comes the bar of the limitations in the bill: "That all claims not presented under this bill within a period of two years from the date of its passage are hereby forever barred, and all lands not so presented are hereby restored to the public domain."

Mr. Chairman, doubtless the gentleman from Colorado and other gentlemen within the sound of my voice have been among those people living along in the localities I have described. If so I would gladly yield five minutes of my time now to any one of them who will rise and say in the presence of the House of Representatives that he believes he knows a single instance, or one in a hundred, in any one of these localities where any person affected in any manner by the provisions of this bill, will go into a court, go through the formality of hiring a lawyer, and present his case for adjudication to be passed upon by the tribunal suggested here.

Mr. MORGAN. How would they know the law had been passed?

Mr. PAYSON. That is a very happy inquiry by the gentleman from Mississippi. How would they know that such a law had been passed, or how many, even if it was brought to their attention, would be able to avail themselves of it?

Mr. SYMES. If the gentleman from Illinois will be as good as his word, I will occupy about a minute in making a response to his suggestion.

Mr. PAYSON. Very well.

Mr. SYMES. This bill provides for notice being published in the English and Spanish languages in the vicinity where these small claimants live; and when this court provided by the bill goes out there, I have no earthly doubt that when the facts are brought to their attention, the attorney who represents these people, or the people themselves if they do not employ an attorney, will see that their little claims are properly presented before that tribunal. All that is necessary is for them to come forward and make their proof that they have been in possession for forty years—I think twenty or twenty-five would be ample; but when that proof is made to the satisfaction of the court that they or their ancestors have occupied this land for forty years next preceding the approval of this bill, no further title or evidence of ownership is necessary. That settles the question. There is no appeal to the court in banc, and that is the end in favor of the small claimants. I submit that it is better than to have an agent traveling around with an attorney and telling them what their titles are worth.

Mr. KERR. Suppose the court decides against them, how can they appeal?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. I wish to avail myself of the opportunity offered by the gentleman from Illinois to make a brief reply to the point made by him a few moments since. Now, the facts which the gentleman overlooks are that these land-grabbers, claiming millions of acres under the law of 1854, have in hundreds of cases in New Mexico and Colorado extended their lines so as to include hundreds, and I do not think I am above the point to say thousands, of these small claims, and claim by virtue of fictitious land grants; and I for one think that ought to be investigated by the court, and the right and title of these smaller farmers and small holders, who hold under a species of vassalage and at their mercy, ought to be settled.

Now, the object of this bill is to aid men of that kind, and they are the vast majority of these smaller holders in the Territory of New Mexico, Arizona and Colorado, who are at their mercy. Section 15 of the bill provides:

> That wherever any claimant shall produce evidence to the satisfaction of the said court of the continuous occupancy and possession, by himself, his ancestors, or grantors, for forty years next preceding the date of the approval of this act, of a piece or parcel of land in either of said Territories or State, not exceeding 160 acres in extent, and not included within the limits of any grant for the establishment of a city, town or village, no further evidence of title or ownership shall be necessary or required from such claimant, but he shall thereupon be entitled to confirmation of his title to such piece or parcel of land.

So that it will be seen no costs are required to be paid at all.

Mr. PAYSON. You have got to have a lawyer?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. He may have to hire a lawyer; but it does not follow that he must do so. He may go into the court without a lawyer. A provision is made here, as will be seen, that he has no costs to pay to establish his title.

Mr. PAYSON. Will the gentleman tell me how one of these Mexicans, who has lived there himself, and his ancestors for two hundred and fifty years, who does not understand a word of our language, would go into the court without the help of a lawyer under that bill? Can he imagine how it is possible for him to do so?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. In reply to that I can only say that when a man is in that condition, under the laws as they exist, by which he is virtually deprived of his property, this bill gives him a chance to come into the court and obtain his remedy.

Mr. PAYSON. But he is not deprived of his property under existing law. Under the law and the treaty between this country and Mexico, his title, if he is still in occupancy, is as good as any man's title. The only difficulty is that in cases where there is a desire to dispossess him, there is no title that he has which is deducible of record. That is the only difficulty he rests under, except possibly in the case that his land may be grabbed by somebody, himself ousted, and the possession assumed by somebody else, while he is unable to resist the aggression. But I am suggesting this because I am showing what I think to be some of the features of this bill which are subject to criticism; and I propose to submit, at the proper time, what I have indicated as, in my judgment, a better scheme altogether. I am not here for the purpose of saying that the act of 1854 is the best enactment that could be made. I do not believe it is. I believe in a better one, as I have outlined it.

Mr. HOVEY. At the expense of the United States?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes; at the expense of the United States. And that the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, unless appealed from, in every grant that embraces less than 11 square leagues of land should be final and conclusive; and as to every grant including more than that, not one of them should ever be confirmed except by the joint action of the two Houses of Congress, with the approval of the President of the United States.

As regards the holders of these smaller areas of land, place it in the power and make it the duty of the surveyor-general of each of these Territories, with a corps of assistants subject to his disposal, to make surveys, to go wherever these people live and, without any expense to them, survey their land and certify the survey to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and let him issue a patent in the mean time prohibiting settlement as against them.

I realize the difficulty of undertaking to prove titles back for forty years. We all know that forty years is more than the average of one generation. In every State of this Union, so far as I am advised, and I can speak absolutely as to my own State, open adverse possession for twenty years is deemed conclusive as to title. Possession for seven years under the claim and color of title is made good there. These lands on which these people have been living are of no great value to anybody except themselves or to one who goes there with a speculative idea.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion in reference to what he was saying a moment ago?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SYMES. In a bill reported from the Committee on Territories, of which I am a member, and similar to a bill which passed the Forty-ninth Congress, it is provided that in proving up these small claims the expense of it should be paid by the Government.

Mr. PAYSON. And it ought to be.

Mr. SYMES. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois in that statement; and I should like to see this bill amended in that particular.

Mr. PAYSON. I said, in answer to the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Mississippi a few minutes ago, that my plan contemplated that. In accordance with the treaty between this Government and Mexico, and even under the promptings of humanity alone, a great, rich nation like this, with a surplus running into hundreds of millions in the Treasury, is engaged in a paltry retail peanut business when it goes to quibbling with some poor, ignorant, harmless being as to who shall pay the cost of providing title for 15 or 20 acres of land when it has been assured to him by the greatest power in this country—the treaty-making power.

Mr. Chairman, let the Government do justice to these poor people. I remember with pleasure, ay, with pride, the fact of the enactment of the homestead law—that grand, beneficent enactment—which with its central idea of "free homes for free men" has been a rallying cry for years; an act signed by that great man from my own State, President Lincoln, and which has been one of the many stars in his crown of glory. I remember all this as I stand here clamoring for this legislation for these dependent poor, as I have for five years! [Applause.]

I think that plan ought to be adopted. Who can possibly be harmed by it? Let us commence at the lower round of the ladder and help the poor and needy first. Everybody who knows anything about these claimants knows that those who are asserting title to these great areas of land bought them for a song—a pittance was paid for what is to-day a principality.

I have the records in my desk in my own committee room of Public Lands of a transaction where a tract of land of 1,700,000 acres was bought with four mules. Then there is this great Peralta grant, involving 7,000,000 acres of land, covering with its dark and blighting shadow the southern half of Arizona, the southwest corner of Kansas, taking in the whole of No Man's Land, part of the Pan Handle of Texas, and part of the Indian Territory. What was the basis of that claim? Simply a voluntary agreement not reduced to writing to colonize a few immigrants on that territory. The papers in that case show that not a dollar of money was invested by the men who were engaged in that great enterprise; a transaction involving 7,000,000 acres of public lands; a territory that is almost one-quarter the size of the great, grand State in which I live, and not a dollar of money invested in it.

Let those men come to this body. The American people has yet a conscience and that conscience is and ought to be reflected here; and when a man has an honest claim, and it can be made to appear that it is honest, he will get it. Suppose it is deferred, he can afford to wait, well afford it.

It is better for men who have valid claims, the confirmation of which may be possible, to postpone them for a few years. They can better afford to permit themselves to be inconvenienced by that delay rather than future generations shall be deprived by the system of worse than robbery of hundreds of thousands, not to say millions of acres of land through hasty methods of adjustment. The inconvenience that can result to them is not to be compared to evils that always have resulted through haste.

I have spoken of limiting the jurisdiction of the Department to claims of 11 square leagues of land. I took that as the unit, and I make this statement for the benefit of those who have not investigated this question. There is a belief—I do not subscribe to it, nor do I deny it—that 11 leagues of land was the most that could be granted under the laws of Mexico in grants to individuals.

It is asserted by some of the best lawyers in the country that that is the extreme amount. I will assume that as a unit in the proposed legislation which I will offer as a substitute for this bill at the proper time. If a claim of that amount or less passes the ordeal of the surveyor-general, of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and of the Secretary of the Interior, then, so far as the General Government is concerned, it can well afford to say that that shall be final. On the other hand, if the decision is against the claimant, he will have a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SYMES. I had presented to me once as an attorney the immense claim which the gentleman has so eloquently described, and as to which he says the only consideration for 7,000,000 of acres was an agreement to colonize a few people on the land. I fully concur with him as to that claim. I told the parties that consulted me that the claim had no foundation which this Government would recognize, and that they had better abandon it. I told them that as a lawyer. But now I ask the gentleman if he cites that as a case such as would be in danger of passing through this land court, if it were created under the proposed bill.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PAYSON. With pleasure.

Mr. COCKRAN. Do I understand the gentleman to suggest that the proper course would be to give an appeal from the Secretary of the Interior to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. PAYSON. I do.

Mr. COCKRAN. Do you find any constitutional authority for that?

Mr. PAYSON. I think I understand the gentleman's point. I know that a question has been raised—and it is a question to which I have given some little thought—as to whether the Supreme Court of the United States, being a court of appellate jurisdiction only and having very limited original jurisdiction in civil cases, there might not be a difficulty in the way of allowing an appeal to that court from the Secretary of the Interior as a matter of practice. In answer to him, I have to say that if upon investigation it should be found that the obstacle suggested does exist—I do not commit myself on that point—there is a very easy way of getting around it by providing that the decision of the Secretary may be entered as a judgment pro forma in the supreme court of the District of Columbia and an appeal be taken from there to the Supreme Court of the United States. But that is only a question of detail, as I think the gentleman from New York will agree. Just how the practice would be regulated is a matter that could be settled hereafter. The principle is what I am after; details can easily be settled.

Mr. COCKRAN. Another question. Would there be any objection to establishing some tribunal, whatever it might be called, equipped with the power to ascertain the facts in any of these controversies, with an appeal from that tribunal direct to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. PAYSON. I am coming to that later, as I said a moment ago to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES], but I may as well state the objection now as at any other time. A good deal of surprise would be expressed by any lawyer here if an adequate statement could be made of the exhibitions of genius manifested by those who are claiming lands under fraudulent grants, in the preparation of their proofs before courts or commissions. I remember that when I read of what was done in California before the commission appointed under the act of 1854, it seemed not only to border upon, but to enter actually into, the realm of fancy and imagination. I did not believe that such things were possible. But I have seen the records covering hundreds and hundreds of pages (and in the reports from the General Land Office and the Department of Justice there are hundreds of pages with reference to these matters in California), records which were manufactured from the first line to the last and appeared to be duly authenticated. Seals were attached with all due formality. Signatures were counterfeited with astonishing accuracy. Affidavit upon affidavit was made that the originals from which these records came had been lost or destroyed, and all apparently perfectly regular, afterwards confessed forgeries, and made easy by the careless way in which archives were kept there.

When I was in New Mexico five years ago this summer, the register of the local land office pointed out to me in what was called the governor's palace, now occupied by our officers as a public building, an outhouse in which he stated there had been kept for months and months the paper evidences of the title to great areas of land in the Territory, easy of access to any, kicked about as rubbish, put in places where neither of us would put a dog, regarded as valueless. Frequently forged papers are inserted in these masses, and then searched for, found, and certified as genuine. This was attempted with the Peralta grant. That these things have been done is beyond question. Now, we all know as lawyers that when you are trying a matter before a tribunal and the trial of the case actually begins, the procession begins to move; it has to be then and there tried to an end upon such material as is at hand. To make myself better understood, I will give an illustration. Suppose that I am attorney for the claimant in one of these land-grant claims and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] is the district attorney under this bill. I prepare my case. Of course the Government has nothing to do but to stand back and see what evidence the claimant has to show why the title should be confirmed.

I get up and offer to the court in the first place a certified copy of a grant made by the proper authorities of the Republic of Mexico away back in 1826 or 1830. By affidavit after affidavit I prove that there was an original of that grant which has been lost, and I produce the depositions of some persons who testify to what is known as juridical possession. These witnesses swear that in their boyhood they remember going with their fathers out upon this land; that their fathers picked up and threw into the air some spears of grass and shouted, "Long live the Republic," or "Long live the King;" that ceremony being equivalent under the Spanish law to seisin under the common law. This sort of proof, as regular as anything can be, is offered. That being the case, what would the gentleman from New York, as attorney for the Government under this bill, do?

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois asks, what would the gentleman from New York do under this bill? I take the liberty of answering by simply reading from section 14 of the bill, which provides—

That whenever the Government, by its attorney, or any person, corporation, or association, shall deny the existence of the right, title, or grant from the Spanish or Mexican Government, under which any petitioner claims lands by petition before said court, or shall allege that the said right, title, claim, or grant was fraudulently obtained, or that there is good reason to believe that the papers or documents under which any such right, title, or grant is claimed are forgeries, then in any such case the petitioner or petitioners shall, upon the order of said court, exhibit to the court, at a time and in such order to be specified, the original papers or documents upon which any such right, title, claim, or grant is alleged to be founded, if the same are in possession of such petitioner or can be obtained by him; if such originals can not be produced by such petitioner, he shall exhibit and file in the office of said court, within such time as the court shall direct, duly authenticated copies of all papers upon which he depends to establish his claim; whereupon if the Government, by its attorney or any proper person, shall certify said court that there is doubt as to the validity of such claim, right, or grant, it shall be the duty of the court to transmit to the Secretary of State of the United States a request that the question in controversy be thoroughly investigated by the representative of the United States Government in Spain or Mexico, or any of the States thereof from which it is claimed any such right, title, or grant is derived.

And thereupon the necessary evidence is obtained.

Mr. PAYSON. There is nothing new in that; we have all read it in the bill. That does not meet the question at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman from Illinois will allow me to ask this question: Is it not likely that in such a case as he speaks of the Government, instead of being represented by a gentleman of the fine legal learning and acumen possessed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], would be represented by some attorney who had no practice at home, who was not fit to have any practice at home, and who had been appointed as a legal representative of the Government because he had had political backing?

Mr. PAYSON. I would rather not answer that question.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] will permit me to decline the compliment which he pays me, and to assure him that it is properly due to the President of the United States, who, under this bill, will see that the Government is suitably represented.

Mr. PAYSON. But we propose at the next election to change the political character of the administration, and will see to it ourselves that suitable appointments are made.

Mr. COCKRAN. Even if such a change were made, I would still have confidence in the administration of justice by the duly-appointed representatives of the Government. [Laughter and applause.] But let me ask a question directly in point in this controversy: Assuming that this tribunal would be exposed to all the weaknesses and dangers which the gentleman suggests, what other tribunal can be devised which will not be exposed to similar influences?

Mr. PAYSON. I meet that question by referring the gentleman to the plan I outlined a moment ago. You have first the surveyor-general of the Territory, supposed to be an honest man; and in the case of New Mexico and Arizona, I know that the officers deserve that character. This remark is no more than is due to those gentlemen, whom I have known from boyhood, George W. Julian and John Hise. Two better men never lived.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I can corroborate the gentleman as to the surveyor-general of Arizona.

Mr. PAYSON. Next comes the Commissioner of the General Land Office, an officer who is, presumably at least, a man of as much ability as the average lawyer who would be appointed to the position of judge under this bill. Next above him would come the Secretary of the Interior; and out of such material, very properly, as to intellect, judges of the Supreme Court are frequently made. Next above him comes the Supreme Court of the United States. I desire to be fully understood. I am not assuming that the judges to be appointed under this bill will be inferior in ability to others in like position, or that they will be lacking in integrity. I am not reflecting on the system by imputation as to either quality.

I am urging that they will be no better in either respect than the men called to act as Commissioner or Secretary, and that the Assistant Attorney-General for the Interior Department will probably be a man of larger experience and learning than the attorney to be appointed under the bill; but the point is that when the case is made up the case of the claimant is ex parte, the Government is not advised of it. The claimant presents only the evidence helping him, and the court must act on that which is presented to it. A court never, never sets on foot inquiries and investigations to be prosecuted outside to help either party on questions of fact. It must, as we all know, leave those matters to the litigants, but under my plan the officers could stop at any stage and make investigations as the proceeding developed occasion. In other words, the Department officials who deal with the evidence at first hand are not compelled to move execpt so far as they may deem it advisable to move, taking into account the best interests of the Government. Nor, I will say to the gentleman from New York, are they compelled to receive testimony as conclusive of a question, as a court would be compelled to do if the matter were on trial before it. If the gentleman will do himself the justice to read through the reports (tedious as some of them are), containing the history of the investigations of some of these private land claims based upon titles which afterward were confessed to be forgeries, he will see that it has been in the past a great safeguard to this nation that officers of the Government, who were called upon to pass on the validity of these claims, the regularity and authenticity of the papers evidencing the title, were not obliged to make a decision until they themselves had carried the investigation farther and in a line upon their own suggestion.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is a necessity for this special tribunal at all. If the machinery of the executive department is sufficiently extensive, if there is a sufficiently large corps of employés to pass upon these questions as speedily as they ought to be passed upon, and the Secretary assures us of the sufficiency, then from motives of economy alone we ought to save the thirty-odd thousand dollars a year which it will cost to execute this bill.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PAYSON. With pleasure.

Mr. COCKRAN. In view of the excellence of the present system, can the gentleman entirely reconcile that excellence with the fact these questions are undetermined and are before Congress asking for solution?

Mr. PAYSON. I will tell the gentleman. I do not assert the excellence in the present plan. Before the gentleman came in I had shown the defect of the present law in this, that it does not permit the Department to decide anything, only to report to Congress.

If it had the power to decide, all the long list of claims I have presented would have been decided years ago, unless pending in the Supreme Court on appeal.

Mr. COCKRAN. Then the only question is whether this is the best method of deciding them?

Mr. PAYSON. No; but what shall be substituted for the existing law, and I prefer rather than to have this bill adopted, which, in my judgment, would render it possible in the future to practice the frauds which have been practiced in the past; and if that is to be the result of its adoption I for one prefer the present delay, under which no possible frauds can be practiced.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a letter addressed to me by Mr. Julian, the surveyor-general of New Mexico, which I heartily indorse and will incorporate in my remarks, omitting the formal heading:

Several projects for the settlement of these titles have been urged. One of these is the creation of a commission, like that provided for California by the act of Congress of 1851. Another is the submission of these questions to the courts of New Mexico, according to the provisions of what is known as Mr. EDMUNDS's bill. Another is the organization of a land court, which shall hold its sessions either in Washington or in New Mexico, for the purpose of hearing these cases. In my opinion none of these legislative schemes are demanded by any necessity. Let me invite your attention to a few simple facts in elucidation of this view.

The act of Congress of July 22, 1854, makes it the duty of the surveyor-general to ascertain "the origin, nature, character, and extent" of these foreign grants, and make full report thereon to Congress with a view to the final action of that body. This work was begun in 1855, and is now substantially completed. The claims are on the files of the General Land Office and before the committees of Congress, including duly certified copies of the papers in each case, the evidence, both documentary and oral, the reports of the surveyor-general, and the supplementary reports recently submitted, all in their orderly connection, and printed. What is obviously wanted is a brief enactment of Congress referring all these cases to the Land Department for decision on the basis of action thus supplied. Congress refuses to adjudicate any more of them, but this certainly does not make nugatory the records thus prepared, but only necessitates their submission to another tribunal. That tribunal is at hand in the Department of the Interior.

In urging this plan of settlement, as I have done during the past two years, I am now supported by Secretary Lamar. In his late annual report he says that "as at present organized and equipped, with a slight increase of force, that Department is fully equal to dealing with and determining all legal questions arising under these grants. It has at its disposal legal talents trained and familiar with questions of law and in the habit of acting judicially in other cases. Representing the executive power of the Government, this Department must, in any event, be a large participant in any action in relation to these grants. The official documents, the archives, ancient and modern, relating to the public lands and foreign grants, are in its custody, and must there remain.

Such a plan, in my opinion, would be simple, inexpensive, and accomplish the settlement of these claims in a much more expeditious and satisfactory manner than any of those heretofore suggested.

If these views are sound the expensive and dilatory machinery of a court or commission is wholly superfluous. Should any such tribunal be established it will be obliged to dispose of the cases on the papers on file in the General Land Office. No other method of proceeding is possible, since the witnesses are nearly all dead, and the record of their evidence must be received. In a few cases additional testimony might be desired, for which provision could readily be made in the act of Congress transferring them. A competent lawyer could decide them as well as a court or commission, for in either case the basis of judgment would be the same. The business would be done speedily, while I have shown in my last annual report that on the plan of a commission like that proposed in Mr. JOSEPH'S bill, or of a court such as the Edmunds bill of the last Congress provides for, the cases would not be settled in a quarter of a century.

That I am right in pleading for the summary method of settlement proposed will more clearly appear by referring to the amount and character of the work involved. In the recent address of Governor Ross before this committee he estimates the number of claims to Spanish grants in New Mexico at five or six thousand. The extravagance of this statement makes it simply ridiculous, and my respect for his official position obliges me to assume that he has been very unfortunately reported. Besides the few unsettled claims in Colorado and Arizona, there are two hundred on the files of the surveyor-general's office at Santa Fé. Forty-nine of these have been disposed of by Congress. Forty-odd additional cases are in such fragmentary and imperfect shape that no action on them is possible, while the claimants, who were notified over two years ago to amend and perfect their applications, have failed to do so. The fair assumption is that the cases have been abandoned. This leaves a residue of only a little over one hundred claims to be disposed of. A few straggling cases in the custody of private parties may yet make their appearance after the lapse of thirty-four years, but this is not probable, and it may reasonably be presumed that the cases now on file and exhibited on the official map of the Territory are all, or very nearly all, that will demand attention.

Nor is there anything difficult or intricate in their settlement. Governor Ross, as reported, tells you that "so intricate and tangled has become the woof and warp of this Spanish and Mexican grant business—so interdrawn the lights and shadows of good and evil intent in their manipulation—that only by the most careful judicial investigation by a tribunal clothed with ample authority to enforce testimony will it be possible to elicit the truth and establish justice." This is poetry, and needs to be translated into the plain prose of actual facts. Of the one hundred cases referred to, many involve very small tracts, like those of the group in the vicinity of Santa Fé. These can be readily disposed of, as they disclose little ground for controversy.

There are a good many colony and pueblo grants, about which there is no real dispute, and in which the grantees or their descendants will hold their lands by occupancy and prescription if the grants should be found technically invalid. Quite a number of other claims, as I have found, are so clearly valid, or else so manifestly invalid, as to preclude controversy, and make their disposition easy and merely formal, while comparatively few of them involve such controverted questions of law or fact as to require any elaborate investigation. There is nothing mysterious or occult about them. They involve none of the niceties of legal metaphysics. As a rule, the grant relied on by the claimant is found among the archives on file in the surveyor-general's office. Its genuineness is easily ascertained, and the cases of forged grants are very few. If it is shown by the archives that juridical delivery of possession was made, and the evidence proves that the conditions of the grant were complied with, a conclusion is readily reached.

The shocking and wholesale frauds that have been perpetrated in New Mexico in dealing with these claims have had their genesis in the brazen and defiant roguery of the claimants and not in the intricacy of the cases as presented. I have personaly examined nearly all the claims in New Mexico, and have no hesitation in saying that the whole batch of them could be disposed of in from one to two years by a competent lawyer who would industriously apply himself to the task, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. There is, therefore, no necessity or even excuse for a court or commission in New Mexico to pass upon them, while "the right of the National Government to lands," as Secretary Lamar says, "can not be wisely left to the arbitrament of local tribunals, which are more or less under local influences and supposed to sympthize with the individual claimant as against the Government." The truth of this statement has been abundantly verified and shockingly illustrated by the action of the California commission, created by the act of Congress of 1851, which became the cat's-paw of land-stealing experts in their triumphant robbery of the public domain.

As to the numerous small landholders in New Mexico who claim no title under any grant and have no right to their little possessions except that of occupancy and prescription, I have been hearing their claims and forwarding their proofs to the General Land Office as in the case of grant claimants. These examinations involve no court charges, and this fact is a great relief to the parties concerned, who are too poor to defray the expenses of litigating their claims before a court or commission. Should the plan I am urging be adopted nothing will be wanting but the action of the Land Department upon their cases.

In urging these views I am decidedly opposed by the grant claimants, but I am sure I represent the rank and file of the people of New Mexico. The Government has left them in the wilderness for more than the third of a century and they now have a just right to a speedy deliverance.

I respectfully submit that this is only possible on the plan I propose, and that to turn them over to the tedious and dilatory machinery of the courts would be to prolong indefinitely the evils under which they have so long groaned.

Yours, truly,

GEO. W. JULIAN.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire only a single word. At the proper time I shall offer the bill I have outlined as a substitute for the bill of the committee, and on it I invoke the favorable consideration of the House; and I thank gentlemen for the kind attention with which I have been complimented.

Mr. McCREARY. I have taken the floor, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of suggesting a recess until Monday morning at 10 o'clock, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the pending bill. I think there is a general desire on the part of the House to get through with this matter, and I will therefore now move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having taken the chair Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. 7643) to establish a United States land court and to provide for a judicial investigation and settlement of private land claims in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico and in the State of Colorado, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. McCREARY. I now move, Mr. Speaker, that the House take a recess until Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment until I can present two amendments to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. McCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS'S proposed amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out the word "forty," in line 4, section 15, and insert the word "ten;" so that it will read:

"SEC. 15. That wherever any claimant shall produce evidence to the satisfaction of the said court of the continuous occupancy and possession, by himself, his ancestors, or grantors, for ten years next preceding the date of the approval of this act, of a piece or parcel of land in either of said Territories or State."

Also, insert after the word "claims," in line 20, page 10, the following:

"And any instrument of writing and any assignment or indorsement thereof shall be regarded as fully proved unless some party to the suit shall deny in his plea that the same is genuine, and moreover, shall file with the papers in the cause an affidavit stating that he has good cause to believe, and does verily believe that such instrument of writing, assignment, or indorsement is forged."

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported a bill (H. R. 9050) for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I reserve all points of order on that bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I was going to do the same thing.

MAJ. DANIEL N. BASH.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move, by unanimous consent, to take up for consideration the bill (S. 258) for the relief of Maj. Daniel N. Bash, paymaster, United States Army.

The bill was read.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let us have the report in that case.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to state, in a moment, that the House bill was introduced by myself and received the unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs——

Mr. BLAND. I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McCREARY. I have not yielded the floor for such a motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not desire to take the gentleman off the floor, and will yield to hear his statement.

Mr. McCREARY. I move that the House take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If that motion is adopted the effect will be to continue the consideration of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. And make Monday Saturday. There is no restriction; the House may be kept in session all day and the Monday session altogether lost.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state a reason to the gentleman from Kentucky that would operate against his motion.

Committee meetings are to be held, and in view of the fact that members of the House are not excused from attendance because of their presence at committee meetings, it would prevent meetings of committees from being held on that day, and greatly inconvenience and retard the business.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I will ask unanimous consent that this bill, now under consideration, be taken up on next Saturday after the consideration hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I will have to object to that, as on next Saturday here will probably be an appropriation bill.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I will say, subject to appropriation or revenue bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will also have to insist upon an exception in favor of the general homestead law.

Mr. STEELE. Pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

MONDAY, April 2, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

HANNAH R. LANGDON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 549) granting a pension to Hannah R. Langdon, which were, in line 4, after the word "pension-roll," to insert "subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws," and in line 8, after the word "rebellion," to strike out "and pay her at the rate of $20 per month from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How will the bill read with the amendments agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read as amended by the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Hannah R. Langdon, widow of Henry H. Langdon, late an assistant surgeon in the Seventh Regiment Vermont Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The amendments were concurred in.

IDA M. WELTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1784) granting a pension to Ida M. Welton; which was to add to the bill the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $18 a month."

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. APOLLINE A. BLAIR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 574) to increase the pension of Mrs. Apolline A. Blair, which was, in line 4, to strike out the words "for and during her natural life."

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, heretofore received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

The bill (H. R. 8962) for the relief of Anthony L. Woodson was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. 671) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased;

A bill (H. R. 2996) to confirm the title of the heirs or legal representatives of Henry Volcker, deceased, to a certain tract of land in the Territory of New Mexico;

A bill (H. R. 6394) for the relief of Hayem & Taylor; and

A bill (H. R. 6879) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to Anson Rudd, of the State of Colorado, certain real estate in the county of Frémont, in said State.

MARY S. LOGAN.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions what is the bill granting a pension to Mary S. Logan, which has just been read and referred?

Mr. DAVIS. It will be remembered that the Senate passed two bills, one for the relief of Mrs. Logan and the other for the relief of Mrs. Blair. The House passed the Senate bill for the relief of Mrs. Blair, and instead of passing the Senate bill for the relief of Mrs. Logan, it passed a bill of its own in the same terms. I now ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 3191, granting a pension to Mary S. Logan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the Senate recall from the Committee on Pensions and proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3191) granting a pension to Mary S. Logan. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary S. Logan, widow of the late John A. Logan, a major-general of the United States Volunteers in the late war for the Union, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $2,000 per annum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there amendments to the bill in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CULLOM. Was not the Senate bill the same?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But this is a bill from the House of Representatives.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope it will be passed at once.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to state that, as a bill precisely the same as this passed the Senate with only seven votes in the negative, I recognize the fact that it would be useless to call for a division or for the yeas and nays. I wish it to go upon the record, however, that I am opposed to the bill, and I shall vote no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

1. That the work of the eradication of pleuro-pneumonia shall be continued under the Bureau of Animal Industry as at present organized.

3. Jervey, in regard to some action by Congress requiring railroad companies to adopt a uniform system of car-coupling in the interest of human life and the safety of passengers and employés of railroads. The memorialists have formulated their opinion in a resolution, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission are instructed to consider what can be done to prevent the loss of life and limb in coupling and uncoupling freight cars used in interstate commerce, and in handling the brakes of such cars, and in what way the growth of the system of heating passenger cars from the locomotive, or other single source, can be promoted, to the end that said commission may make recommendations in the premises to the various railroads within its jurisdiction, and report its doings to Congress, at an early date, with such suggestions as to legislation on said subjects as may seem to it necessary or expedient.

I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a memorial of the governor of Tennessee and sundry citizens of the county of Greene, in that State, remonstrating against the passage of the animal-industry bill, which is now the special order. I move that the memorial lie on the table.

Joint resolution recommending the continuance of the relations between the State Live-Stock Sanitary Board of Maryland and the Bureau of Animal Industry of the United States.

Whereas the contagious disease known as pleuro-pneumonia exists to such an extent in portions of the United States as to greatly damage the animal industry; and

Whereas the existence of such disease is due in the first instance to the lack of proper quarantine regulations on the part of the Federal Government against known infected foreign countries: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That it is the duty of the Federal Government to defray the expense of extirpating such disease.

Resolved, That it is unwise and of doubtful constitutionality for the General Government to undertake alone to regulate within the limits of a State matters quarantine, and the numerous petty penalties connected therewith, elsewhere than at ports of entry, and in respect of imported or exported cattle.

Resolved further, That the present system of co-operation between the State Live-Stock Sanitary Board and the Federal authorities is the best and only practicable plan for eradicating and preventing such diseases; and the thanks of this body are hereby cordially tendered to the Commissioner of Agriculture and the Bureau of Animal Industry of the United States for their efficient co-operation with our State authorities in accomplishing these objects; and this General Assembly does heartily recommend the continuance of these relations, which have been productive of so much good.

Approved this 30th day of March, 1888.

Speaker of the House of Delegates.

President of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1204) to provide for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States at Martinsburgh, in the district of West Virginia, reported it with amendments.

DOCUMENTS FOR STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 77) to supply the Department of State with copies of bills and other documents, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Public Printer to furnish the Department of State, out of the usual number, with ten copies of each bill and joint resolution, and twenty copies of each executive document, miscellaneous document, and report of committee of either House of Congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7315) to divide the Great Sioux Indian reservation into separate smaller reservations, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the said bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. PEEL, Mr. HUDD, and Mr. NELSON managers at the conference on its part.

SIGNAL-OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2565) to appropriate a sum of money sufficient to carry out the provisions of the act approved March 5, 1888, entitled "An act for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, also for the erection of the necessary store-houses, for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, at the city of Washington, D. C.;" which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, also for the erection of the necessary store-houses, for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, at the city of Washington, D. C.," approved March 5, 1888.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to make a word of explanation showing the necessity for this bill.

Congress passed an act, which was approved on the 5th of March last, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a site in the city of Washington, including the building upon it, for the use of the Signal Service, the site and building not to cost over $112,000. It also authorized the erection upon the land of certain store-houses, the whole cost, including site, not to exceed $150,000. It was supposed that the act carried with it an appropriation. The Secretary of the Treasury submitted the question to the Attorney-General, who decided that notwithstanding the bill contained a direction that the property be purchased, it did not imply an appropriation.

It is the desire of the Treasury Department that the appropriation shall be made, and promptly made, because the negotiations for the purchase of the property are interrupted for want of the formal words of appropriation in the act.

Mr. COCKRELL. And this simply appropriates the sum?

Mr. SPOONER. That is all. It appropriates the money to carry out the provisions of that act.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to state further that the Committee on Appropriations examined this subject-matter some years ago very thoroughly, and incorporated the appropriation upon one of the appropriation bills passed by the Senate, but it was struck out in conference? I hope that the bill may be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 2566) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Meridian, Miss.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 29th ultimo approved and signed the act (S. 1665) granting a pension to Theresa B. Hoffman.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 2550) appropriating $20,000 for expenses of special and select committees of the Senate;

An act (S. 2220) to correct an error in and to further amend "An act to authorize the Georgia Pacific Railroad Company to construct bridges across the Sunflower, Yazoo, and Tombigbee Rivers, in Mississippi," approved March 3, 1887; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 65) to print Executive Document No. 51, first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, on the subject of cattle and dairy farming.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE HEARINGS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage be authorized to employ a stenographer for the purpose of reporting arguments before it, who shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, and to have the arguments before it printed.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the arguments before the Committee on Woman Suffrage April 2, 1888, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that extra copies be printed.

BILLINGS, CLARK'S FORK AND COOKE CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I give notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 325) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad the right of way through the Crow Indian reservation.

FLORIDA LAND TITLES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. CALL March 31, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators shall be appointed, to be selected by the President of the Senate, who shall inquire whether it is essential or advisable for the protection of actual settlers on the public land of the United States in the State of Florida, which has been heretofore patented or certified to other than actual settlers improvidently or without authority, that suits shall be brought by the United States to cancel such patents, the committee to report by bill or otherwise, and further report such other legislation as may be necessary for the protection of actual settlers on the public lands of the United States in the State of Florida and for the settlement of the title to the public lands in the possession of such settlers.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolution may go over this morning in order that the members of the Committee on Public Lands may have some conference in regard to it. I hope they will agree to it, as I should prefer not to have them antagonize it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over. The morning business is closed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2927) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the amendments be acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be followed, if there be no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment was, in section 3, line 2, after the word "spans," to strike out the words:

The two middle or channel spans thereof shall not be less than 600 feet in length in the clear, and no span shall be less than 450 feet in length in the clear.

And to insert:

Before approving the plans for said bridge, the Secretary of War shall order three engineer officers from the Engineer Bureau to be detailed to the duty of examining, by actual inspection, the locality where said bridge is to be built, and to report what shall be the length of the main channel span and of the other spans: Provided, That the main channel span shall in no event be less than 700 feet in length, or the other spans less than 600 feet each in length; and if the report of said officers shall be approved by the Secretary of War, the spans of said bridge shall be of the length so required.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 17, before the word "feet," to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least 75 feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 4, after the word "whenever," to strike out "Congress" and insert "Secretary of War;" so as to read:

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved, and the right to require any changes in said structure, or its entire removal, at the expense of the owners, whenever the Secretary of War shall decide that the public interests require it, is also expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Are the amendments being acted upon as they are reached?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the bill is being read.

Mr. SHERMAN. One amendment has been passed which I desire to have left open—the amendment relating to the height of the bridge.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate can return to it when the reading of the bill is completed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to add to the bill the following additional section:

SEC. 9. That an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn.," approved February 26, 1885, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in line 17 of section 3, fixing the height of the bridge, was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, line 17, before the word "feet," strike out "sixty-five" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read:

The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least 75 feet above extreme high-water mark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The adoption of the amendment was purely informal, and the question on agreeing to it will be regarded as before the Senate, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I move to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred;" so as to fix the height at 100 feet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to prevent the passage of this bill, because I know that the Mississippi River, and all the rivers, must be bridged. I am not opposed to bridging the stream; but Congress some years ago adopted definitely the proposition that no bridge should be made across the Ohio River, the Mississippi River, or the Missouri River unless it either contained a draw or was elevated to 100 feet above low-water mark. This is the first departure, I believe. The Senator from Tennessee may tell me whether there is any bridge over the Mississippi of a less height than 100 feet.

Mr. HARRIS. I will inform the Senator from Ohio that a week or ten days since the Senate passed a bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Natchez, 300 or 400 miles below Memphis, at a height of 75 feet. There is now on the statute-book an act passed in 1885 authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, with a span not less than 550 feet in length, at the height of 65 feet above high-water mark.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the act which it is proposed to repeal.

Mr. HARRIS. The last section of this bill proposes to repeal that act.

This bill not only provides that the bridge shall not be less than 75 feet, but by the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce it is provided—I read section 3—

That the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans. Before approving the plans for said bridge, the Secretary of War shall order three engineer officers from the Engineer Bureau to be detailed to the duty of examining, by actual inspection, the locality where said bridge is to be built, and to report what shall be the length of the main channel span and of the other spans: Provided, That the main channel span shall in no event be less than 700 feet in length, or the other spans less than 600 feet each in length; and if the report of said officers shall be approved by the Secretary of War, the spans of said bridge shall be of the length so required.

With the absolute requirement that no bridge shall be built until the Secretary of War approves the plan, with the absolute requirement that he shall send three engineers to the site of the bridge to inspect carefully the whole matter and determine upon what plans and the exact place at which the bridge is to be built, it seems to me that the rights of navigation have never been so well protected by any bridge bill that has ever been reported to either House of Congress from the beginning of the Government to this hour.

Mr. SAWYER. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that the Secretary of War recommends 75 feet. That is why we changed the bill from 65 to 75 feet. That is as high as any bridge that has been constructed since I have been on the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Mississippi River been bridged with an altitude of only 75 feet above low-water mark where there was no draw?

Mr. HARRIS. Can the Senator from Wisconsin inform me as to the height of the St. Louis bridge?

Mr. SAWYER. I do not remember now, but it is not near as high as this.

Mr. HARRIS. Can the Senator from Missouri inform me as to the height of the St. Louis bridge?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that Congress at the last session passed a bill authorizing the building of a bridge on the Mississippi River below St. Louis, the height of the principal span of which was 65 feet.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, we have got information, most of which I already knew. I do not know, and do not believe now, unless Senators will so inform me who live on the Mississippi River, that Congress has ever authorized the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi, Ohio, or Missouri Rivers of a less altitude than 100 feet. If I am mistaken in this, I should like to know it.

Mr. PLUMB. Undoubtedly you are mistaken; there are fifty of them authorized.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where are they?

Mr. PLUMB. I will furnish them by the score in a few minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will convince me that the Mississippi River has been bridged at a less altitude than that, I shall have nothing to say. I have received a great multitude of petitions and papers on this general subject, mainly from persons engaged in navigation at Louisville and on the Ohio River above; and I remember the sad experience we passed through here once, about fifteen years ago, in respect to a bridge at Cincinnati. Up to that time Congress had refused to allow the erection of any bridge across the Ohio River less than 100 feet altitude above low-water mark, but finally——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator observes that this requirement is 75 feet above extreme high-water mark.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what I wished to get at.

Then Congress did pass a bill at the urgent request of the Pennsylvania railroad system authorizing the construction of a bridge at Cincinnati of 70 feet altitude above low-water mark. There was a struggle over that, but it was finally passed. It was soon ascertained after the bridge had been partly finished, and when it was ready for the superstructure, that to put that superstructure on the piers as they stood, 70 feet above low-water mark, would endanger navigation; but Congress asserted its power and compelled that company to change its plans and to raise the bridge to an elevation of 100 feet. The Senator from Vermont, who is here [Mr. EDMUNDS], knows about that very well, because he took one view of it and I think I took another. The people of Ohio, who were interested in the construction of the bridge, insisted upon it that that bridge should be raised to 100 feet, and it was raised.

Mr. ALLISON. That much above low-water mark?

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred feet above low water; and that bridge was raised at an enormous expense, which was paid by the company under a provision inserted in the bill. The claim was made that Congress had no right to compel this raising of the bridge; and it was provided that in case the Supreme Court should decide that Congress had no right to compel this at the expense of the company the Government should pay the expense, and if the decision should be against the railroad company the company should pay it. The Supreme Court decided that the power of Congress was supreme in the matter, that they had a right to judge and require the bridge to be raised at the expense of the company.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to make a suggestion to him? His suggestion, as I understand it, is that the bridge shall be raised 100 feet above low water.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. As a matter of fact the difference between extreme low water and extreme high water at Memphis is 48 to 50 feet. This bill requires that the lowest part of the superstructure of the bridge shall be not less than 75 feet above extreme high water.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that be so, that falls within the rule I have been enunciating.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill even goes beyond the rule that the Senator has been insisting upon, because, as a matter of fact, there is a difference of between 40 and 50 feet between low and high water mark.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have that clause of the bill read, for all I wish is to protect the interest of navigation on the Mississippi River. Read that section.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans. Before approving the plans for said bridge, the Secretary of War shall order three engineer officers from the Engineer Bureau to be detailed to the duty of examining, by actual inspection, the locality where said bridge is to be built, and to report what shall be the length of the main channel span and of the other spans: Provided, That the main channel span shall in no event be less than 700 feet in length or the other spans less than 600 feet in length; and if the report of said officers shall be approved by the Secretary of War, the spans of said bridge shall be of the length so required. The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least 75 feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, and the bridge shall be at right angles to and its piers parallel with the current of the river.

Mr. SHERMAN. With that provision I do not see that there ought to be any complaint made by the people along the river. All I ask is that the same provision in substance shall be applied to the Lower Mississippi River as was applied to the Ohio River.

Mr. SAWYER. This will be a much higher bridge than was required there.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I am satisfied. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that in providing for a bridge to be built across the Missouri River at Louisiana 50 feet was established as the height above high water. That has been the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Missouri River is a different stream from the Mississippi.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bridge at Louisiana, in Missouri, is across the Mississippi River.

Mr. PLUMB. I should have said the Mississippi River.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say one word in furtherance of the remarks made by the Senator from Kansas. At my own town there is a bridge which I believe is the highest bridge on the Mississippi River at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the height?

Mr. ALLISON. Fifty feet above high water. I believe it is satisfactory to the people who navigate the river.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the rise of water there?

Mr. ALLISON. Between high and low water mark, where I live, the difference is 23 feet.

Mr. COKE. If in order, I move, in section 2, line 12, that the words "seven hundred" be stricken out and "one thousand" inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce, if there be no objection, that the amendment that was informally reconsidered is agreed to. Now the Senator from Texas moves an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. HARRIS. That is an amendment to an amendment of the committee already acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. COKE. Very well; I will reserve it.

Mr. BERRY. I move to amend, in section 1, line 12, by striking out after the word "and" down to and including the word "of," in line 14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 12, after the word "and," it is proposed to strike out "at the option of the corporation by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of;" so as to read:

Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and wagons and vehicles of all kinds.

Mr. BERRY. The object of the amendment is to make it obligatory upon the company to provide a passage-way for wagons and foot passengers. As the bill now reads it is left optional with the company whether or not they will make such a foot-passenger bridge. The object of my amendment is to require them to provide a bridge for passengers and vehicles. I think this is a proper amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. My own judgment is that there ought to be a wagon-bridge, but having telegraphed to the president of the Merchant's Exchange and Cotton Exchange of the city of Memphis, somewhat to my surprise they say that a large proportion, perhaps the majority, of the people there think it unnecessary. Therefore, I am willing that the bill shall pass without such an amendment, though my own judgment was different.

Mr. BERRY. The people of Memphis are not the only persons interested in this bridge; but there are people in Arkansas, on the western side of the river, who live adjacent to Memphis, who have large interests and constant trade and commerce with Memphis. Their cotton finds a large market there; they go there to purchase supplies. The bridge ought to be made convenient for wagons and passengers on foot and on horseback. I happen to know that there are a number of persons in the city of Memphis who are anxious that the amendment should be adopted, and I know it is to the interest of the people on the western side of the river that it should be done. Therefore, I think, the mere fact that the president of the Board of Trade of Memphis is against it ought not to control the Senate when there are so many reasons to the contrary.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no doubt it would convenience the people on the western side to have a wagon-bridge; but if it is going to add infinitely to the expense, and thereby prevent the construction at all, the object in view will be defeated. It seems to me that is a question which ought to be left to be determined by the return that will probably be made, which will be settled, of course, by the parties who build the bridge, in favor of that form of expenditure if it is likely to result in profit. If it is not, then to attach such a condition to the bill would be to prevent the building of a railroad bridge, and thus the existing impediment to commerce at that point would be continued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am opposed to any further stopping up or obstructing the great water-ways of the United States, which are about the only free thing, commercially considered, that is left to the people as against the corporations; but if these obstructions are to continue, then I am in favor of making them as liberal towards the common people who do not own a railroad as I possibly can, and make them as safe for navigation as I possibly can under the circumstances.

If these railway people can not build a bridge there which shall allow the passage of wagons and foot passengers, they had better not have the bridge at all. Memphis is a great city, and has a great trade on both sides of the Mississippi River; and when these railway people are to build a railway bridge they can, with a very slight additional expense, comparatively, provide for the convenience and comfort of the people of the United States who live on both sides of the river in that vicinity. If the parties who are interested in this railway project happen to own ferries there at present, I can readily see how they think the public would not want any provision made for the passage of a man or a horse and wagon; but we all perfectly well know that the additional expense of providing a footway or carriageway either above or alongside the railway bridge, when the whole structure is going on together, is a very small thing indeed comparatively. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will be agreed to.

Mr. BERRY. I do not know by what authority it is said that requiring the company to add a passage-way for passengers and wagons will increase the expense largely. I am thoroughly in favor of the bill. The people of my State are in favor of the bill. I have supported it all the way through. But those people who live on the western side of the river desire that there shall be a passage for wagons, and, as was said by the Senator from Vermont, that with very little addition to the cost of the railway bridge the company can provide a way which will be a great convenience to parties who live on the western side of the river; and I do not think it will have any tendency whatever to defeat the passage of the bill, or prevent the construction of the bridge. I do think it is proper and right that Congress should provide in this way for the convenience of those people who reside near Memphis and trade with Memphis.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not say it would prevent the building of the bridge. I do not know that it will; it might even accelerate it; but what I meant was that as the purpose I had in view, and as I think the main purpose in securing this bridge, is to make uninterrupted communication between the interior of the country and the Atlantic seacoast by means of a railroad which will cross this bridge, it is not wise to take up the mere local trade and transit across the river at that point to the possible impediment of the more important part of this great natural highway. It may aid it, and if it would, then the option of the company to build the bridge in that way would be all that would be necessary.

Mr. BATE. As one of the representatives of Tennessee, I have been anxious, as has been my colleague, for the passage of the bill; and I believe before the committee no such suggestion as this amendment was made; but, notwithstanding that, I believe it will be to the interest of that people, especially to that city, to have this amendment made. Representing, in part, the wishes and interests of those people, not having been communicated with by the friends of either side, and wishing to do that which I believe will ultimately be to their interest, I shall vote for the amendment.

Every such bridge charter granted this session to railroad companies over a river in that State, as far as I know, has in it the substance of this amendment; and believing it necessary to have a bridge for the interests of Memphis as well as for the interests of Arkansas on the other side of that river, and there being no petition from the citizens against it, why should we make a distinction between this and any other bridge? It should be so made as to contribute to the convenience of the people on both sides. I favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, although there has been no petition here, so far as I am aware, affecting it one way or the other.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to ask the senior Senator from Tennessee if this is the contested Memphis bridge.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say to the Senator from Tennessee who has it practically in charge that the two Senators from Louisiana who represented an opposing interest are absent from the Senate, and I received this morning from the attorney who represents the interests that they favored a request that this bill should not be taken up and disposed of until the return of the Senators from Louisiana. I simply submit the request, having no desire myself in the premises.

Mr. HARRIS. I was aware of the fact that the two Senators from Louisiana were absent. I was aware of the fact that certain constituents of theirs now have the control of the charter granted in 1885. I was aware of the fact that the senior of these two Senators desired to be present. I was aware of the fact that he was here in the city for a week after this bill was reported to the Senate. He was confined to his house, however, by indisposition, and was not in the Senate. I informed him directly once, and indirectly through a messenger of his own two or three times, that I would delay asking the consideration of this bill a reasonably short time, but the anxiety of the people whom I represent, the anxiety of the people who propose to build this bridge to have the authority to do so, and to avail themselves of a suitable season of the year to commence the work of construction are such that I could not delay asking the Senate to consider it for the unreasonable time that would be covered by the absence of those two Senators looking after a canvass in Louisiana.

I would regret as much as any Senator on this floor even to seem to be wanting in courtesy to any Senator upon this floor, especially any absent Senator; but this is a matter of too much importance to the commerce of the country and the people whom I represent to allow me to delay longer the consideration of the Senate from whatever action the Senate may choose to take upon it. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] had full notice before he left here that I would not wait, but would insist upon consideration.

Mr. FRYE. I simply desired to make known to the Senator the wish expressed to me this morning by the attorney, not indicating by my request any opposition to the opinions of the Senator from Tennessee, for I fully concur that the bridge bill ought to become a law.

Mr. HARRIS. I quite understand the motive and object of the Senator from Maine, and am obliged to him for the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On page 5, section 5, line 17, I move to insert, after the word "built," the words "or commenced." There will be no objection to that, I am sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 5, line 17, after the word "built," it is proposed to insert "or commenced;" so as to read:

And until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be built or commenced.

Mr. HARRIS. There can be no objection to that amendment that I can see.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move, with the same idea precisely which I suppose was intended in the bill, to add, after the word "War," in line 20, striking out the period and inserting a comma, the words:

And shall not be made or commenced until the same is so approved.

That is, if they change the plan they shall not go on with the work until the change is approved.

Mr. HARRIS. That is exactly on the line of the other amendment, and is unobjectionable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 5 it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma, and add:

And shall not be made or commenced until the same is so approved.

So as to read:

And should any change be made in the plans of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to approval of the Secretary of War, and shall not be made or commenced until the same is so approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In section 7, page 6, line 10, the top line, I move to add, after the word "establish," the words "and maintain."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, line 10, after the word "establish," it is proposed to insert "and maintain;" so as to read:

And on failure of the company or persons aforesaid to make and establish and maintain such additional structures within a reasonable time, the said Secretary shall proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move, in line 12 of the same section, on the same page, to strike out the word "shall" and insert "may cause the said bridge to be removed at the expense of the owners thereof, or may."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, line 12, before the word "proceed," strike out "shall" and insert:

May cause the said bridge to be removed at the expense of the owner thereof, or may.

So as to read:

The said Secretary may cause the said bridge to be removed at the expense of the owners thereof, or may proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense, etc.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will explain the object of that amendment. There is another very proper clause in the bill, that if this bridge turns out to be obstructive to navigation, etc., the Secretary of War may cause the thing to be entirely removed. Now, I am afraid that if they construct the bridge, the clause standing as it is in the printed bill, if the owners should not comply with the requirements of the Secretary of War in regard to the safeguards about approaches, etc., or doing the additional things requisite to make it as convenient for navigation as possible, in that case the Secretary would lose the power which is reserved to him in the former section of requiring it to be removed altogether; and therefore I simply repeat what is a former provision of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then in line 13 of the same section I think there must be a misprint or a clerical mistake. The clause now reads that the Secretary of War may cause these additional things "to be built or made at the expense of the United States." All the preceding clauses very rightly, as I think, require all this to be done at the expense of the owners of the bridge, although done by the Secretary of War. Therefore I move to strike out "United States" and insert the words "owners of said bridge, and in that case;" so as to read:

The said Secretary may cause the said bridge to be removed at the expense of the owners thereof or may proceed to cause the same to be built or made at the expense of the owners thereof, and in that case shall refer the matter without delay to the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. That was what was intended by the original language.

Mr. FRYE. It is evidently a mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to make one suggestion to the committee, and that is a mere matter of form and taste, to put section 6, the right to alter, amend, and repeal, at the end of the bill as the last section, where it ought to be. It is now in the middle of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to transpose section 6 so that it will be the very last section in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. COKE. I move, on page 3, section 3, line 12, that the words "seven hundred" be stricken out and "one thousand" inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the Committee of the Whole in section 3, line 12, before the word "feet," it is proposed to strike out "seven hundred" and insert "one thousand;" so as to read:

That the main channel span shall in no event be less than 1,000 feet in length.

Mr. COKE. There is a minority report which accompanies this bill from the Committee on Commerce, signed by Senators GIBSON, RANSOM, GORMAN, KENNA, and myself, in which we recommend that there shall be at least one span of not less than a thousand feet in width, and that the height of the bridge shall not be less than 85 feet. We predicate this recommendation upon the opinion of the Mississippi River Commission, composed of civilian and Army engineers, who say:

It is our opinion that if a bridge is permitted at Memphis it should have at least one channel span with a clear opening, at right angles with the current, of 1,000 feet; and that the lowest part of this span should be 75 feet above extreme high water.

That is the opinion of a commission of eminent engineers, both civilian and Army engineers, who, for eight years before the opinion was given, had been studying the Mississippi River, and especially the matter of a bridge at Memphis. I will send the minority report to the Secretary's desk and ask that it be read:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted the following minority report, to accompany bill H. R. 2927:

The undersigned, the minority of the Committee on Commerce, beg leave to report their dissent from the majority report of said committee on the following points:

They concur with the majority of the committee that a bridge should be constructed in the interest of railway transportation across the Mississippi River at or near Memphis, which has become a railway center. They would deny no reasonable facilities to accommodate railway traffic, but in their judgment, if a bridge can be constructed at Memphis which will afford ample facilities for communication with the trans-Mississippi country by railroad and highway at a cost proportionate to the amount of business to be done, and altogether reasonable, it should be erected, without interfering with the trade and commerce on the river, which, it must be remembered, already exceed in value our entire foreign commerce, and are constantly increasing with the development of the agricultural, mining, and manufacturing resources of the vast population inhabiting the great valley; and it must also be borne in mind that the function of the Mississippi River is to determine, within certain limitations, the rates of freight all over the country.

The Government of the United States, appreciating the importance of this great national highway, created a commission, by act approved June 29, 1879, composed of General Gillmore, General Comstock, Major Suter, distinguished engineers of the Army; Mr. Harrod, chief engineer of the State of Louisiana; Mr. Taylor, Mr. Ferguson, graduate of West Point and an Army officer, and likewise a distinguished engineer. The Government has also appropriated about $12,000,000 (not to speak of four and a half millions which were expended on the Eads jetties to secure deep water at the mouth of the river) for the improvement of the river from the Head of the Passes to St. Louis, and the plan adopted by them, at first held by many to be experimental, has produced the most beneficial results wherever it has been applied.

Every interest, therefore, of the people of the whole country requires that the proposed bridges should be erected without impairing the navigation of the Mississippi River, if it can be done at a reasonable cost and by the appliances and methods generally adopted throughout the world by engineers in constructing bridges.

We desire at the outset to call attention to an error which we find in the report of the majority. They say that the length of the span, 700 feet, concurs with the present judgment of the War Department, although the Board of Engineers now recommend a height of 70 feet. We find nothing in the report to justify this assumption. Now, what does the Chief of Engineers say on this matter? General Duane, in a letter addressed to Senator GIBSON March 3, 1888, says:

"Below Cairo to Natchez the Board of Engineers were divided as to the length of the channel span to be required, and recommended a clear headway of 70 feet above high water, with all other spans over channel way not less than 600 feet between piers. The Mississippi Commission recommended 1,000 feet for the channel span at Memphis, and not less than 750 feet at Natchez, the length of the span at these two places being determined by the existing local conditions, and the height at both was 75 feet clear headway above high water."

General Duane, Chief of Engineers, further says:

"This office approves the recommendations of the board so far as they apply to bridges for all portions of the river except below Cairo; for this portion it is of the opinion that no bridges should have less than 75 feet clear headway above high water, and that the length of the channel spans should be left for a Board of Engineers, provided for in the modified bill, to determine, with the approval of the Secretary of War; and that the length of such spans should be regulated by the physical features of the locality where it is proposed to erect the bridge and the requirements of navigation at that point."

It will be observed, therefore, that neither the Chief of Engineers nor the Board of Engineers have concurred in recommending that the central span should have a minimum length of 700 feet, but that the Chief of Engineers recommends only that a board should be provided to determine the question. Now, we think that a board consisting of the Army engineers and civil engineers on the Mississippi River Commission, which has been making an examination of the phenomena of this river for the last eight years (a complete and scientific survey of it in all respects), should have great weight as the very highest authority that can be found in the determination of a problem that vitally concerns the vast industries and interests depending upon the free navigation of the Mississippi River. They recommend that the minimum length of the central span of the bridge at Memphis, owing to the local conditions, should be 1,000 feet. We do not think this at all unreasonable. We know that the War Department has invariably adopted the minimum length of spans provided for by Congress, and we deemed it important, therefore, that the minimum, so far as the Mississippi River is concerned, should be made not less than 1,000 feet, and that the height should be not less than 85 feet.

We beg to refer to the testimony of the representatives of the steam-boat and barge lines plying on the river, from which it will be seen how rapidly the tonnage by the barge lines is increasing, and that the largest steam-boats require at least 85 feet headway.

These conditions may be very easily complied with in the construction of this bridge. Bridge building within the last few years has undergone a revolution by the application of the cantalever system, which is now adopted in the construction of nearly all important bridges. A few years ago, when Captain Eads proposed to build a bridge over the Mississippi River at St. Louis, it was held by engineers generally that a span of over 500 feet was impracticable. Now many bridges are being constructed with twice that length of span, and some with three times that length.

The first cantalever bridge built in this country was designed by Mr. C. Shaler Smith, and constructed over the Kentucky River. Since then a cantalever bridge has been built over the Niagara River, which has one span 170 feet above the water and 470 feet long, the total length of the cantalever being 910 feet. The cantalever bridge across the Hudson River at Poughkeepsie contains five spans each of from 500 to 521½ feet in length and from 130 to 160 feet in clear headway. The Kentucky and Indiana bridge across the Ohio River near Louisville has spans of 480 to 483 feet and a clearance of 109 feet above low water; and the proposed bridge over the East River, at Blackwell's Island, contains two spans of 810 feet each, with a clearance under the middle of the spans of 152 feet. And the bridge over the Frith of Forth, in Scotland, is about 1 mile long and contains four spans, two being of 1,700 feet in length and two of 675 feet in length, with a clear headway of 152 feet.

Now, the water-courses over which these bridges have been constructed can not be held to be more important than the Mississippi River, and we have no doubt that the promoters of this enterprise will find that a minimum length of 1,000 feet of the main span and a height of 85 feet are not unreasonable, and that engineers will be found competent to erect such a bridge. This has been admitted by the engineers.

There is one peculiarity about the Mississippi River, and especially about the local conditions at Memphis, which necessitates a wider span than on any other place on the river. The commerce is carried on now chiefly in barges, and as Capt. Smith S. Leach, of the Engineer Corps of the Army, and secretary of the Mississippi River Commission, says:

"A tow, for instance, of thirty-eight pieces, carrying 700,294 bushels of coal, would in length extend 900 feet, while its width would be 265 feet." Now, when such a tow meets a bend in the river the steamer begins backing to pull the upper end of the tow, and the tow itself, away from the concave bank. This operation is called 'flanking.' In this way in passing bends the axis of the tow becomes inclined to the axis of the river, and in case of sharp bends or swift currents may be at right angles to it. "Such is the case," he observes, "in tows passing Memphis." He also says that the tows have to retain the oblique position in passing nearly the whole of the Memphis front. "It must be remembered," he further observes, "that the channel on the west side of President's Island is the main channel, and is the one which requires the most flanking, and that in the progress of the improvement of the river it may be advisable to close the other." Hence we are to determine the necessities of the case by the length rather than by the width of the tows on the Mississippi River, so far as the Memphis front is concerned.

One source of the greatest expense in building bridges over the Mississippi River is the cost of the piers, for it is necessary to dig down it may be 75 feet in order to secure a firm foundation for them; but by increasing the length of the main span the number of piers may be diminished.

We believe that these suggestions are founded not only in the interest of the trade and the commerce on the Mississippi River, but in permanent advantage also to the railway bridge. For it must be considered that if a bridge should be constructed over that river which will materially obstruct the channel and impair its navigation, the people of the valley will insist that it shall be removed; and it will be removed. Hence we submit that the recommendations of the Board of Engineers, which have had charge of the improvements of this river for nearly ten long years and who can not be actuated by any bias, should be accepted.

We therefore propose that the bridge at Memphis should have one channel-span with a clear opening at right-angles to the current of at least 1,000 feet, and that the lowest part of this span should be at least 85 feet above extreme high water.

We beg leave to refer to the recommendations of the Board of Engineers and Chief of Engineers respecting bridges (marked document A); and the communication from Major Post relating to cantalever bridges (marked document C); and to the table showing the tonnage transported by the New Orleans barge line during the years 1868 to 1888 (marked document D); and to the other documents annexed to this report.

R. L. GIBSON.
M. W. RANSOM.
RICHARD COKE.
A. P. GORMAN.
J. E. KENNA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the exhibits to be read?

Mr. COKE. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], which will be again read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out of the committee's amendment, in section 3, line 12, before the word "feet," the words "seven hundred," and insert "1,000;" so as to read:

That the main channel span shall in no event be less than 1,000 feet in length.

Mr. SAWYER. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAWYER. A span of 700 feet, it seems to me, is wide enough. It is over four times as wide as Pennsylvania avenue from building to building. That is only 160 feet, and four times that would be 640. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. I will not consume the time of the Senate by asking that the report of the majority of the Committee on Commerce be read that favors the passage of this bill as reported from that committee, but I will ask that the Secretary read a communication which I hold in my hand from General George S. Field, who is the engineer and a member of the Union Bridge Company, which I understand to be the largest and most successful company of bridge-builders in America. This question was submitted to him by the friends of this measure, and I ask that the Secretary read his letter of response.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNION BRIDGE COMPANY, New York, March 19, 1888.

GENTLEMEN: I have yours of 16th, asking difference in cost of Memphis bridge if built in accordance with the recommendations of the majority or minority report of the Senate Committe on Commerce.

The longer span and greater height, recommended by the minority, will increase the cost about $425,000. On page 5 of pamphlet containing the two reports you will find the following: "Now, many bridges are being constructed with twice that length of span (500 feet), and some with three times that length."

As far as the writer is aware no bridge has been built, for railway purposes, with spans longer than about 500 feet; and none are in course of construction, with the one exception of the bridge across the Firth of Forth, in Scotland, which is referred to, and which is such an enormously expensive structure that there is not traffic enough crossing any stream in this country, at any one point, which would pay 2 per cent. on its cost. As a matter of fact I believe the transfer of freight and passengers can now be made at Memphis by ferry at a less cost to the railroad companies than if they build a bridge costing not to exceed $2,000,000; and if conditions are imposed which will increase the cost much beyond that sum the scheme will not be inviting to capital. The reference in the minority report to the Niagara cantalever bridge may be misleading to persons not familiar with the subject. The clear span, between abutments, is about 470 feet (as stated), and not 910 feet, as some might suppose from reading the report. Nine hundred and ten feet is the distance from end to end of the bridge, including both shore-arms, which project over the land.

As a professional bridge engineer and builder it seems to me that the entire subject of length of spans and height above water is in perfectly safe hands, as far as the interests of navigation are concerned, when it is referred to the War Department.

On page 6 the minority report refers to reducing the cost by diminishing the number of piers. The number of piers will be the same in either case, four (two in the river proper and one at either end of the long spans) will have to go, practically, to the same depth, and will cost substantially the same, whichever plan is adopted.

Yours, truly,

GEO. S. FIELD.

Messrs. BRITTON & GRAY,
622 F street Northwest, Washington.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire simply to say that from General Field's letter it appears that the increase of length of the span and the height of the bridge as recommended by the minority of the Committee on Commerce will increase the cost $425,000, and in his opinion that increased cost would so add to the difficulties in the way that capital would not be justified in building the bridge.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator must not forget that since the bridge bill was referred to Mr. Field there has been an amendment adopted to-day in the Senate providing for additional bridge accommodations for foot-passengers and horses and carriages, etc., and if that additional weight is added to this span of a thousand feet the increase will be very much greater than $425,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Unquestionably. I have no exact estimate, but I think it is quite safe to state that the wagon way added to the railroad bridge will increase the cost certainly not less than $100,000.

Mr. FRYE. More than that.

Mr. SAWYER. I am told from the very best authority that the wagon bridge alone will increase it a half million dollars. Who would ever go over a bridge 75 feet high in a wagon?

Mr. HARRIS. I can not state what the additional cost of the wagon way would be, but certainly it would be over $100,000; possibly the full amount suggested by other Senators.

The commerce of the country needs and demands a railroad bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis. Of course, residing as I do on the bank of the Mississippi River, I am about as much interested in protecting the navigation of that river as any other Senator on this floor can be; but there is a larger commerce, a very much larger commerce, crossing that river by rail than floats up and down it. It is the duty of Congress in regulating these matters to protect the interests of the river and the rail commerce, and where there is a conflict a fair and reasonable and just compromise between them must be worked out.

Under the provisions of this bill as it comes from the committee no one conclusion is more certain than that the rights of navigation will be protected without the amendment of the Senator from Texas. The bill fixes 700 feet as the minimum length of the channel span; but it also requires the Secretary of War to send three Army engineers to the ground to inspect it, to determine where the bridge shall be built, and determine how long and how high the spans shall be, and to report to him exactly how high and how long each span shall be; and when he receives that report the bill requires that no bridge shall be built until he approves the plan as to the length of span and height of bridge.

What better guard, what better protection, can the rights of navigation demand than is already incorporated in the bill in the amendments that the Committee on Commerce have reported and that the Senate has agreed to? I do not see any reason whatever why the amendment now proposed fixing a minimum of a thousand feet should be put into the bill. If that committee of engineers shall report that a thousand feet is necessary, that 1,200 feet is necessary, or that 1,500 feet is necessary, it will be the duty of the Secretary of War to require the plan to conform to that recommendation and give to navigation all the protection that navigation is entitled to. The rights of navigation could not be better protected by any possibility than they are protected by the bill as it stands amended. The minimum fixed by the amendment of the Senator from Texas is not only unnecessary, but it is fraught with this great evil: it may involve such a cost for building the bridge as to defeat the construction of a bridge altogether.

The New Orleans Barge Line, during the last year, according to the report of the minority, floated up and down the Mississippi River four hundred and some odd thousand tons of freight, while one single railroad, the Kansas City and Memphis, carried across that river at Memphis over 600,000 tons of freight within the same period. The commerce crossing the river is vastly more important in bulk, more important in tonnage, vastly more important in value than that passing up and down the Mississippi River; but all that I ask is that fair and equitable compromise between the interests of the land commerce and the interests of the river commerce which will give to each the highest, the fairest, and the most just measure of protection that we can give to secure a fair chance for the traffic of the country.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, the report of the minority of the committee, as I remarked awhile ago, is predicated upon the opinion of the Mississippi River Commission, composed of the ablest engineers in this country, among them Captain Eads, Army engineers and civilian engineers. They say:

It is our opinion that if a bridge is permitted at Memphis it should have at least one channel span, with a clear opening at right angles with the current of 1,000 feet; and that the lowest part of this span should be 75 feet above extreme high water.

The opinion was delivered after this commission had for eight years been studying the phenomena of that river, appointed to make a scientific survey of it, which they did make, and to direct its improvement.

This great river should not be obstructed. It is true that a great deal of commerce crosses it, but it must be remembered that the Mississippi River is the great regulator of railroad freights in this country. The Mississippi River and its tributaries and the Great Lakes alone prevent the railroads from owning this country so far as transportation is concerned, and all these water-ways should be preserved open and free, and no obstruction should be permitted on one of them; and when able men like these—not men employed in the interest of railroads to deliver opinions, not gentlemen employed in the interest of the city of Memphis or the State of Tennessee or the State of Arkansas to give opinions, but gentlemen whose duty it is to supervise the improvement of the Mississippi River and do it in the most scientific manner—when such men, with only the interest of the Government and the people of the United States at heart, have expressed the opinion that a span not less than a thousand feet should be required on a bridge that crosses the Mississippi River at Memphis, why should we allow less?

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. Is he a member of the Commerce Committee of the Senate?

Mr. COKE. I am.

Mr. PLUMB. Did he not consent to the passage through that committee and through the Senate of a bill for the bridging of the Mississippi River at Natchez, several hundred miles below Memphis, with a maximum span of 750 feet?

Mr. COKE. There is a difference, as stated by the commission, between bridging at Memphis and lower down the river.

Mr. PLUMB. Did not the Senator further consent to the passage of a bill through that committee and through Congress in 1885 which provided for a maximum span of 850 feet at Memphis?

Mr. COKE. Probably I did; but I say to the Senator that since that time I have learned something that I did not know then.

Mr. PLUMB. I am very sure the Senator did not then.

Mr. COKE. Here is the opinion of the Mississippi River Commission, and upon that I stand. Congress can not afford to take the risk of putting an obstruction in the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him if he is afraid to trust the Secretary of War upon the opinion of a committee of three Army engineers specially detailed to the duty of going upon the ground and carefully investigating every condition that should be considered in respect to the preservation and protection of the rights of navigation?

Mr. COKE. Well, that is a question which I hardly think is a fair one. It is simply a matter of judgment. The gentlemen who have expressed the opinion upon which I base my action are very able men, and I do not desire to sit in judgment on the relative merits of the Secretary of War and the Army engineers and these gentlemen. I simply say that I am satisfied with this opinion of the River Commission, and I do not believe that what they say would be an obstruction to the Mississippi River ought to be placed there by Congress, and they do say that a bridge with a span of less than a thousand feet at Memphis will be an obstruction in that great water way which they were detailed by the Government to survey scientifically and to superintend the improvement of. I hope, Mr. President, that my amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 5034) to provide for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business be informally laid aside. It can not take long, I am sure not an hour, to complete the consideration of the bridge bill, and I appeal to the Senate to allow it to proceed until it is finally disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, and that the Senate continue the consideration of the bill which has been before it this morning. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT. I should like very much to oblige the Senator from Tennessee; but I can not give my consent to have the other business which is now in order delayed by this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I appeal to the Senator from Connecticut; and I will say that if the consideration of this bill shall extend beyond an hour I will uncomplainingly allow it to be laid aside and the unfinished business proceeded with; but I am exceedingly anxious to end this matter to-day. I ask its consideration for one hour, and one hour only. I think we can get through with it in twenty minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Do I understand that if the objection is withdrawn and this debate should run more than an hour, it would then be the order of the Senate that it be laid aside and the unfinished business be taken up?

Mr. HARRIS. I will consent to lay the bridge bill aside if it is not disposed of in an hour; I think we can dispose of it in twenty minutes.

Mr. PLATT. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish it to be subject to a call for the regular order at any time.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection the Senate continues the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2927) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River, at Memphis, Tenn. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS (when his name was called). I have had a pair made for me with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who I believe favors the bill as reported. I think I should vote for the widest span, if I were at liberty.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Missouri I know would vote against this amendment if present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I do not vote.

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question if present, I withhold my vote. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COKE (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. CALL. I announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. PASCO] with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. MANDERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore abstain from voting.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I refrain from voting.

Mr. CULLOM. I announce the pair of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], and of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] with the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 43; as follows:

YEAS—3.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to section 4 in a mere matter of phraseology. In the first part of section 4 there is a provision for all railroad companies having equal rights over this bridge, as is very proper. Then at the end of the section is a provision that if they disagree about it "all matters at issue between them shall be decided by the Secretary of War, upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties." It has occurred to me that there is some very technical language, "at issue" for instance, and then "upon a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties."

The Secretary of War has no power under this bill or any other that we can possibly pass to compel any party to come forward and make his allegations and his proofs; and so in order to save any possible difficulty of that kind I move to amend section 4, in line 11, by striking out after the word "upon" the words "a hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties," and inserting "reasonable notice to the parties in interest and upon consideration of such allegations and proofs as may be submitted to him."

Then a period; and then I wish to add the following to save all rights in case the Secretary of War does not decide.

But the last foregoing provision shall not be held to exclude the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair is right. The pending question is on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Is a separate vote desired on any amendment?

Mr. SAWYER. I desire a separate vote on the amendment that would compel the company to build a foot and wagon-bridge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved. Will the Senate concur in the other amendments?

The unexcepted amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will now be on concurring in the amendment reserved by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 12, after the word "and," the Senate as in Committee of the Whole struck out "at the option of the corporation by which it may be built, may be used for the passage of;" so as to make the clause read:

Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railway trains, and wagons and vehicles of all kinds, for the transit of animals, and for foot passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be approved from time to time by the Secretary of War.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in this amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BERRY. I simply desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is the same amendment which was adopted in Committee of the Whole, which requires the company to provide a passageway for passengers on foot and in vehicles. As I stated then, it will not interfere with the building of the bridge, in my opinion, in any way whatever.

I think it is entirely proper that persons who reside on the west side of the river, who are in the habit of trading with Memphis, who go to Memphis for their supplies, ought to have the right to go across the bridge as well as the railroad company, and it would be no great hardship to the railroad company to provide a footway over the bridge. I think it is a proper and necessary requirement. I can not understand why privileges should be granted to railroad companies to which the people there are not equally entitled.

The statement made here that it would cost over $100,000, I do not believe. I do not see how it would be possible or why, if it should cost $100,000, this convenience should not be made for those interested in the commerce there.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will ask the Senator from Arkansas if he knows how the cost of building this extra bridge is to be reimbursed to the railroad company?

Mr. BERRY. I would answer the Senator from New Jersey that the bill requires parties to pay toll to the company building the bridge. It authorizes the company to charge toll for the use of the bridge. The expenses for building the passage for vehicles and foot passengers is to be borne by the railroad company; but they are authorized to charge a reasonable toll, the amount to be determined by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SAWYER. The Senator from Arkansas says the company ought to have the right to build the bridge in this way. Of course they will if they deem it advisable; but what is proposed is to force the railroad company to build it to accommodate vehicles and foot passengers. If they want to build the bridge in that way, let them do it. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. McPHERSON. I suppose there is no bridge on the Lower Mississippi farther down than Memphis. Here it is proposed to establish an important, expensive, and extensive bridge structure. It is proposed on the part of the Congress of the United States to give to a railroad company the power to build a bridge, with all the obstruction to navigation which any and every bridge imposes. Now, it is very evident that the people of that locality can neither be prevailed upon, nor the Government, to build a bridge suitable for the accommodation of the public unless a railroad company does it.

Mr. SAWYER. I think it is equally apparent that nobody will go in a wagon over a bridge 75 feet above high water when he can go by ferry.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very true. People may have the option to go by ferry; but at the city of New York there is a bridge across the East River and hundreds of thousands of persons cross it each day. At times of the year the ferry facilities are not adequate, and they are not at all times safe. In case of storms, in case of large quantities of ice floating down the river, certainly the ferry facilities are not such as the people of that locality want. Now, as I said, if the people there can not build this bridge, inasmuch as the Government proposes to permit a railroad company to build a bridge and persons are willing to pay toll for the accommodation they are to receive, at the same time not interfering with the railroad facilities at all, it seems to me Congress ought to be willing to grant that privilege and to impose that responsibility on the railroad company.

Mr. BATE. In all probability it will be many years before there will be a demand for another bridge over the Mississippi River in that locality. Memphis is a growing city, which is increasing in population, rapidly developing in business interests, and this is the only chance they will have for a number of years, in my opinion, to have a wagon or foot-path way over the Mississippi River at that point, and for the convenience of that locality and looking to the future this amendment should pass. A bridge will cost millions of dollars, and this addition can readily be made while it is being constructed, at such a small additional cost that it seems to me it can not be objected to. It ought to be done now, so as to secure for all time the advantages derived to all classes of citizens from such a bridge. In this matter we should look to the future as well as the present. I hope the amendment will prevail.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I understand that he would vote for the report of the committee just as it stood, if present, and therefore I withhold my vote. I should vote for the amendment if at liberty.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I refrain from voting. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 30, nays 11; as follows:

So the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, line 11, after the word "upon," strike out the remainder of the section in the following words:

A hearing of the allegations and proofs of the parties;

And insert:

Reasonable notice to the parties in interest, and upon consideration of such allegations and proofs as may be submitted to him; but the last foregoing provision shall not be held to exclude the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in such cases.

Mr. HARRIS. I think that amendment improves the bill, Mr. President.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference with the other House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SAWYER, Mr. VEST, and Mr. HARRIS were appointed.

CONSIDERATION OF THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to state that to-morrow during the morning hour I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the resolution before the Senate, which I think has the right of way in the morning hour, to suspend Rules XXXVI, XXXVII, and XXXVIII, so that the fisheries treaty may be considered in open session. I desire to give this notice so that there can be no more pleas of delay on the ground of absenteeism. I desire to give the notice, furthermore, so that those who are afraid to vote against the proposition may absent themselves.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. FARWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 163) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to apply the surplus money in the Treasury to the purchase of United States bonds or to prepayment of interest on the public debt; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PURCHASE OF BONDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5034) to provide for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. PALMER to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART. I propose some instructions to the committee. I move that the instructions which I send to the desk be added to the motion to recommit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada moves to amend the motion made by the Senator from Michigan by adding instructions, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And that the committee be instructed to report without delay a separate bill allowing owners of either gold or silver bullion, or both, to deposit the same in any mint or assay office of the United States, and receive coin certificates therefor at the market price of such bullion, such market price to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st and 15th day of each calendar month, and when either of these days shall fall on Sunday, or any other holiday, such statement shall be made on the following secular day, and the price so stated shall be equal to the average quotations of such bullion in the New York City market during the fifteen days next preceding such statement: Provided, That the price stated by the Secretary of the Treasury for gold bullion shall not exceed $1 in such certificates for 25.8 grains, troy weight, of standard gold, nine-tenths fine, or $1 in like certificates for 412½ grains, troy weight, of silver, nine-tenths fine, and that bullion below the standard value shall be reduced to the required fineness at the several mints and assay offices of the United States, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at the same cost as is now charged for reducing gold bullion to the standard required for coinage.

That the coin certificates so issued shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That they shall not be of less denomination than $1 or more than $1,000, and that one-half of the amount so issued shall be of denominations less than $50, and shall be redeemable in gold or silver coin at the option of the United States; that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be coined from time to time such portion of the bullion so deposited as may be necessary to enable him to furnish coin for the redemption of such certificates; that all coin certificates so issued shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in contracts heretofore made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for a division of the question on the motion to recommit and on the instructions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust if the Senate recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance it will not send instructions with it. It is not exactly fair to the committee, nor is it fair to the Senate. It is very unusual indeed to instruct a committee in advance upon a proposition which has been introduced for the first time. The Committee on Finance are so constituted that the Senator's colleague is a member of the committee, and he can present this question to the committee when the subject is there considered. To tie them down to a particular proposition would simply compel the committee to report back the proposition and take away from them the consideration of the question. If the Senate instructs the committee, as a matter of course all the committee can do is to report back the proposition, which has never been considered by the Committee on Finance. Such a course as that is unusual. It would be substantially reversing the whole policy and plan of the Senate, which organizes its committees to inquire into and submit propositions.

Here is a proposition of instruction requiring the Committee on Finance to report so and so. If the Senate are in favor of this proposition, let them adopt it; the committee will not be responsible. If these instructions are given, the committee will report back this very proposition without amendment or change, because the Senate having passed upon it, the committee, being a subordinate part of the Senate, would as a matter of course be bound to adopt the proposition without amendment.

This measure is suggested as a practical plan. There is no objection to the passage of what is called the bond bill with the authority to purchase bonds in some form. The law now on the statute-book is precisely the equivalent of the proposition reported by the Committee on Finance. There will be no additional power given to the Secretary of the Treasury by the passage of the original bill as reported. It was thought best, rather than to allow an executive officer to be in doubt as to his power, to pass the bill in this form, and it was so reported from the Committee on Finance, the committee unanimously agreeing that that is the substance of the present law; but to remove the doubt in the mind of the executive officer the Committee on Finance were willing to have the law re-enacted in somewhat different phraseology.

However, this is a different proposition. I trust that the Senate will act upon the question as to the extent of the power they will confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury, leaving these other questions to be referred afterwards to the Committee on Finance. If the Senate has made up its mind to deal with this financial question in its length and breadth, including the silver question and the reissue of United States notes, and all the difficult problems of finance which have been discussed in the last twenty-six years all over the country—if it is the desire that the Committee on Finance should take up these propositions and submit a report upon them and a bill, that is one thing. The vote the other day indicated that such is the purpose of the Senate. If so, let it be so; but that is no reason why we should delay action upon the bill reported by the Committee on Finance upon a totally different subject.

I was in hopes that the Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Kansas would allow these different propositions to go to the Committee on Finance with instructions not to report a particular proposition, a particular formula, but to report upon the subjects-matter; and I have no doubt the Committee on Finance would do the best it could to make such a report. Whether we should be able to agree or not, we certainly should obey the disposition or vote of the Senate, and regard the vote already taken as in the nature of an instruction to report some proposition upon the subject. I have no disposition to evade it or avoid it; but as practical legislators, it seems to me, we ought to deal with the question we have now before us, leaving these other questions to be matured more carefully by the Committee on Finance.

I shall, therefore, vote against any instructions to that committee. I shall vote against the recommittal of the bill to the committee. We have all considered the original proposition and reported it; and if any amendments are made to it, let them be made here. Nothing can be gained by recommitting the measure to the Committee on Finance. My impression is that it would be the better course for the Senate to act upon the original bill, amending it as they see proper, leaving these much more important questions to be considered by the Committee on Finance under instructions or without instructions.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not wish to be understood as attempting to interfere with the action of the committee. It has been assumed that there is nothing in the original bill but what everybody agrees to; but under no circumstances could I vote for the original bill in the present stringency of the money market. In the last two years we have retired of national-bank circulation $160,000,000. The passage of the bill as it came from the other House would retire more, how much more can not be stated accurately. There are $67,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds on deposit as security for national-bank currency. It is very probable that if the United States goes into the market with $150,000,000 of money to buy bonds with and is forced to buy bonds, we shall buy those bonds at a high premium. If that is the only remedy which Congress suggests, the President would regard it as an instruction to buy bonds; and if the United States goes into the market with that amount of money to buy bonds we shall buy up that $67,000,000, and we may buy up a portion of the 4 percents deposited as a basis of national-bank circulation.

There are $115,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds which are deposited for that currency and the withdrawal of which would inevitably produce a large amount of contraction if we authorize the President to go into the market with this vast amount of money to buy bonds, and if we pass a law which he would regard as mandatory, and justly so. On all hands it is agreed that he may do it now; but he has very properly said that the provision was in an appropriation act, and he was doubtful whether that was the policy of the Government. He hesitates as to the exercise of the power. There is no doubt about his power to do it, but he hesitates whether it is the policy of the Government, whether it is understood that it should be the permanent law, and he does not like to execute it; but if we pass a law like this now it will be regarded as mandatory to expend the surplus in purchasing bonds. That would produce a considerable amount of contraction, and it would enhance the value of the bonds.

I say that the bill ought not to pass, in my judgment, without providing some way of increasing the circulation. At all events, we should adopt some mode to keep the circulation as it now is and have it increase with the population.

My proposition is a very simple one, and I do not think that it can injure anybody. It certainly will produce no violent expansion, because it has behind it a permanent limitation, a limitation which has been used for two thousand years and which has never failed to be stringent enough—the extent of production. Such a limitation never produced inflation or injured any human being. The whole extent of the production of the two precious metals has never injured the world by inflation.

The Government only pays the market price for the bullion. We take it as it is. We take the price reduced now to 74. We take the price that has been fixed by legislation. By demonetizing silver we have reduced the price, and the Government would only pay the market price for the bullion and issue its certificate therefor. Those certificates would certainly be as well secured as we could desire. You talk about the security of national-bank notes, but it is nothing compared with that. You have no security for those notes but the credit of the Government.

You say you have the bonds of the Government deposited. Certainly you have; but would it not be just as good security for the Government to print the bonds and have the Treasury to stick them in a pigeon-hole, and hold them there, and save the interest, and put out greenbacks? You talk about security beyond the credit of the Government. The national-bank notes are nothing more; but when you have silver bullion, dollar for dollar, in the Treasury for the paper put out, you have then something which the world has regarded as security from time immemorial.

It seems to me that it is time to return to a specie basis and not invent any scheme of inflation or any scheme to put out any kind of money except what is based upon bullion or coin. When we do not get enough of that we can then invent other schemes of money.

It is said we are going to get too much of it. I do not think there is any danger in that direction. The proposition is a very simple one, and I should like to have an expression of the opinion of the Senate in regard to it. I want a vote on it. I want each Senator to express himself.

I am laboring under great difficulty in talking to-day on account of a cold, and I will merely say that I want a vote in some form in the Senate upon this question, for I believe the Senate and the country are in favor of using silver as a basis of circulation. I believe a majority of the Senate is inclined that way, and I should like to have an expression of the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, the question, briefly stated, is simply this: The President had expressed a doubt as to authority vested in him under the act of 1881 to invest the surplus in the Treasury in the high-premium bonds. The act of 1881, to which I allude, was passed as an amendment to an appropriation bill; and legislation in this way—of such import—has always been held to imply some urgent necessity at the time, which could and would be supplemented in a more formal manner at a more convenient time. Since this act passed the premium upon the bonds has largely increased, and the period of time within which it would be possible for the Government to redeem them at their face value very much nearer than when the act of 1881 was passed. No censure can attach to the President for deciding to await the advice and action of Congress, before taking so important a step, that does not with double force apply to Congress itself for not taking prompt action on this matter at the opening of the present session. Four months of valuable time since this session began has been practically wasted, the surplus during this time nearly doubled, and not a thing done to arrest it, notwithstanding we were early advised by the President that he desired speedily the action of Congress in respect of this subject.

The House of Representatives have passed a bill which has received the unanimous report of the Finance Committee of this body, which simply authorizes the President to invest the surplus in the Treasury in the bonds of the United States and thus place the surplus once more in circulation among the people. The members of both political parties in the House of Representatives in a wise and conservative spirit, without any attempt to change the financial policy of the Government, as is being done here, passed this bill.

Neither the President nor his financial secretary are to blame for a congested Treasury. It was the duty of the last Congress, anticipating as it did this very condition of things, to have reduced the revenue.

It is charged, however, that the Secretary of the Treasury, without warrant of law and against public policy, has left large sums of the public moneys in the possession of the banks on pledge of Government bonds. If this has been done in violation of any law, I would like to see the law; if against public policy, go ask the people North, South, East, and West what they would gain if this vast sum were to-day tied up in the Treasury, instead of fructifying and assisting their industries.

Is this money any safer lodged in the subtreasuries without any security for its safety than are the security of the bonds pledged in the Treasury of the United States? It seems to me clearly not. Is there any danger of loss to the Government when we are willing to pay a much higher rate for the bonds than the pledged rate? Moreover, the present Secretary of the Treasury would hardly be able to obtain a patent upon this device for relieving the public necessities. Priority of invention could justly be claimed by a former administration, with this difference, however, that large sums are said to have been left in Wall street without any security whatever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator whether he thinks it would be a safer or wiser policy to allow a Secretary of the Treasury to select his particular pet banks to have the use of this money, to lend it out on interest, or whether if he were to distribute it among the banks at all it should not be upon an even and square footing to every one?

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will name a single bank in the United States of America that was willing and able to and did offer an amount of security equal to a single day's deposit where the Secretary of the Treasury did not give that bank the same opportunity that he has given to others, then I will submit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not precisely the question. I am speaking of the principle of the proposition, to leave it to the discretion of any chief financial officer of the Government, with $60,000,000 or $100,000,000 in his hands, to select at his discretion to whom he will intrust it, whether banks or private people, at any time of the year, whether it is a political year or any other. That is my question.

Mr. McPHERSON. The answer to that is simply this: The President of the United States conceived that it was an exercise of power that he ought not to take, to purchase the bonds in that way and relieve the congested condition of the Treasury. What, then, was there left for him to do? With almost a financial panic staring us in the face, with the currency needed in the affairs of the people, he proceeded to distribute the money to any bank that would give the necessary security. If you are going to leave any discretion with the Secretary of the Treasury at all, it must be such a discretion as will enable him to avail himself of all the securities offered, come from whatever source they may. That is my answer.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will bear with me a moment until I get through with a simple statement of the case, I will then try to answer any question he may ask me.

It is always dangerous to attempt to change the financial policy of a great government without some pressing necessity exists for such change. What the Treasury now requires, and all it requires by way of legislation, is the authority this bill gives to relieve it of the present surplus, and to prevent another surplus by reduction of taxes.

We have in circulation three hundred millions of standard silver dollars whose intrinsic worth is much less than the legal value decreed by Congress, that are kept for all the purposes of business on a par with gold. The Government creditor can go to the Treasury and exercise his own option as to the kind of money in which he shall be paid—gold or silver coin or their certificates, Treasury notes, or national-bank notes. Just so long as the Treasury is able to do this the infirm short-legged silver dollar will be as good as gold in all business transactions; but when the Treasury can no longer maintain the equality between the gold and silver coin then the public will begin to look out for themselves.

I am unalterably opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada, which proposes in effect that we shall establish a Government pawn-shop for the relief of producers and holders of silver bullion. It proposes to issue coin certificates upon the market value of silver bullion. If upon silver bullion why not upon wheat or provisions, and in this way help the farmer as well as the silver producer? Why not issue a certificate upon old clothes, as they do in Chatham street, and give you a pawn certificate in return? You expect an increase in the market value of silver bullion under this policy?

But this is not all. You have the profits resulting from the use of the certificates; you make them a legal tender in the payment of debts, and thus force them into circulation as money. In short, you establish a bounty system based upon silver bullion without any of the taxes or restrictions you impose upon the national banks, and there is not a national bank in existence to-day that would not hasten to surrender circulation. This amendment means the free coinage of silver, pure and simple, with all that implies. Upon the authority of the producers of silver I fix the yield of silver for the past year at not over one hundred millions. Of this amount, some thirty-five millions have been used in the arts, and we have coined over thirty-two million of silver dollars—we have coined more than all the rest of the world combined for new coinage. It is true the silver coinage of most other nations is full, and many of them are restricting rather than increasing their silver coinage. The producers of silver here seem not to be satisfied with their own Government as long as it refuses to take the whole surplus silver of the world for coinage purposes.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator permit me to state what we propose to do? We propose to relieve the country from the stringency of the money market which is driving all enterprising people into bankruptcy. We propose to allow the farmers of the West to receive a higher price for their wheat and their corn, and we do not propose to destroy but to build up industries. We propose to return to the usages of the fathers, and have a sound currency. We do not propose to nurse and foster national banks or any banking institutions that are built up at the expense of the Government. There is no sense in the Government putting out its paper and paying interest on it, and have that same paper deposited in vaults and then issue to somebody else the money. We propose to stop all that, which we regard as unjust. We propose to allow the money of the country to be limited.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will finish his speech after I get through, I shall be very much obliged to him. The Senator from Nevada says that under my policy I propose to favor the national banks. Under the statement made by the Senator himself the national banks have become to-day practically useless so far as circulation is concerned. He says they have surrendered $160,000,000 of circulation. Under what sort of fostering process have the national banks surrendered $160,000,000 of circulation?

Mr. STEWART. I will tell you. By the gold basis you have raised the bonds and made them so high that they can make more money by selling the bonds at 130 than they can by using the money for any other purpose. You have raised the bonds by contraction so that you are almost killing your pets.

Mr. McPHERSON. You have raised the value of the bonds by the wise and conservative policy of this Government in maintaining the public faith and the public credit. I wish to say of the gentleman who sits on that side of the Senate, who was once the finance minister of this Government—I speak of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]—that this country is indebted to him very largely for maintaining the public credit and the public faith, until to-day the bonds of the Government can be sold in the public market at 2 per cent. interest. The burden of interest that was once weighing down this Government and this country has been removed by a wise, conservative, honest, and faithful policy, and I want it continued with no such innovations as are here proposed.

Mr. STEWART. I do not propose an innovation. I propose to lend it upon bullion. I propose to adhere to the wisdom of the fathers. I understand the Senator does not know the difference between wheat and gold or silver as a money basis. I draw a distinction between wheat and the gold and silver money that is used.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator wait long enough to consider that there has been no more fluctuation in the value of wheat during the past ten years than there has been in the value of silver? Why not, then, wheat as well as silver?

Mr. STEWART. The Senator is mistaken. There has been a greater fall by 8 per cent. in wheat than in silver. Silver has risen faster than wheat.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am equally opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. If more currency is needed, I would much prefer an increase of the coinage of silver under the limitations of the act of 1878 to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, which proposes to start anew the printing press and give us a new issue of Treasury notes, which is equivalent to borrowing so much more money or making so much more debt, when it is not debt but money that troubles us.

Let me suggest to the Senator from Kansas that it would be safer, wiser, and more business-like to apply, if needed, such portion of the special funds now lying idle in the Treasury to the object he has in view rather than the mode he proposes. The business interests of the country demand prompt action by Congress on this bill. It is not a political question, and any Senator who attempts to make it so assumes a grave responsibility.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER], to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, of course I have no idea of entering into a discussion of a question so broad and important as that which is presented by this amendment; but I desire to say that with many of the features of the amendment I very decidedly sympathize, and with some modifications I should be inclined to vote for it. But, as has been suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, the exigency which confronts the Treasury Department is such that I prefer to vote for the bill as it came from the other House, in order that the executive department may have the means and the power and authority to meet the exigency which is claimed, and which I suppose it is not denied by anybody, is upon the country. I therefore shall vote against the amendment in this form, as I shall vote against all amendments to the bill; and in doing that I do not wish to be understood as committing myself against the principles involved in these amendments.

The pending amendment would be very far-reaching in its operations if it should become a law. As I stated a while ago, and as I said to the mover of the amendment, my inclination is to support it, and, with some modifications and restrictions, I shall support it at the proper time, upon a proper occasion, and in connection with a proper bill; but I do not believe this to be one of those conditions, and therefore I shall vote against this and almost all amendments, and trust that the bill may be allowed to pass as it has been reported, I am informed, by the unanimous approval of the Committee on Finance of this body.

With this statement, sir, I am prepared to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, we seem to be in a tangle in regard to this measure, but I think we can all substantially agree if we can only get to understand each other. None of us want to contract the existing currency. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] was designed, as he very properly said, for a single purpose, and that was to prevent any contraction of the currency growing out of the withdrawal of national-bank circulation, which is inevitable as we all know, and will be more rapid as the bonds on which it is based are purchased. All the 3 per cent. bonds are paid off. The sinking fund, as it now exists, requires the annual purchase of at least $50,000,000 of four-and-a-halfs or fours now, and by its provisions it must increase annually, and the bonds for the sinking fund must be bought at whatever premium the holders see fit to demand. The contraction of the national-bank circulation has been very great for the last three years, say $140,000,000, and upwards of $102,000,000 of greenbacks were deposited in the Treasury two months ago to take the place of the bonds which had been withdrawn to secure the payment of national-bank notes not yet returned, the bonds which originally secured the circulation having been paid off. Several propositions are pending to guard against the dangers of the contraction produced by this condition of things.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill to use the legal-tender notes thus held in the purchase of bonds. Suggestions have been made to extend it to the $100,000,000 now held in the Treasury for the needless purpose, as I think, of guarding the legal-tender or greenback circulation. I assume that none of us desire to contract the currency by the authority we propose to give by the pending bill to purchase bonds. None of us desire to go into a general debate in regard to all the questions of finance that would greatly delay and perhaps defeat the bill. I therefore propose to offer at the proper time, as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, so as not to raise the question of unlimited silver coinage or the issuing more legal-tender notes on this measure, the following:

That whenever the circulation not in liquidation, or any portion thereof of any national bank shall be surrendered and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase at the market price thereof an equivalent amount in silver bullion in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000 worth per month for coinage purposes, as provided in the act passed February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and restore its legal-tender character."

Mr. STEWART. I will state that if that amendment can be substituted for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, I will withdraw my amendment to the bill and allow the bill to pass with that amendment.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear it. It seems to me my proposition would avoid the danger of contraction, and establish no new principle; it could do no possible harm. It would insure a continuance of the existing currency and prevent the contraction that would otherwise follow by the withdrawal of the national-bank circulation, which will follow the purchase of the bonds with the surplus.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that the difficulty with all this business is—I think it is obvious to more Senators than myself, and I try to pay attention to it as much as I can—that after hearing these propositions read, not sprung on the Senate with any improper purpose at all, it is impossible for me to understand (it may be for others perfectly possible) precisely what is the scope and effect of what is proposed. Why is it not more sensible to send this bill (which in itself is entirely unnecessary, in my humble judgment, a pure re-enactment of existing law) back to the committee with these various suggestions and let that committee consider and report precisely what, in view of all these suggestions, ought to be done?

Mr. BECK. The only answer I can make to that is, that the committee reported the bill as it came from the other House with some verbal amendments; it was entirely satisfactory to all the committee, but great differences in opinion have sprung up in the Senate. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] was offered and inserted in the bill in Committee of the Whole, its sole object, as he avowed, and as I believe, being to guard against a contraction of the currency. My proposition which I will offer as a substitute does that to the same extent, while it guards against contraction by the use of one of the coins of the United States which is now recognized by law as unlimited legal tender and upon which certificates can be issued under the authority given last year in the sundry civil appropriation act. We thus avoid all question as to the policy of extending the legal-tender notes beyond their present limit.

Further answering the Senator from Vermont about the effect of the proposed measure, I will state that the moment we purchase bonds on an extended scale (and we are obliged to purchase them in order to get clear of the immense surplus now in the Treasury, as well as to get clear of the very bad condition of things which exists by deposits of over $60,000,000 in national banks), the President has said in his message that he regards that condition as very bad. He deprecates the necessity of having to deposit the public's money with national-bank depositories, and allow them to loan that money out to the people to whom it belongs at 6, 8, or 10 per cent., or whatever the laws of the State in which the national depository is located allow them to loan it at. It is only tolerated as being better than to lock it up in the Treasury. The moment we offer to buy bonds we have necessarily to purchase bonds held now by the national banks as the basis of existing circulation.

There are about $230,000,000 of 4½ percents left, and I think about $100,000,000 of them are held by the national banks as the basis of their circulation. I may be mistaken as to the amount so held. Nearly all their bonds are either 4 or 4½ percents, a large portion of them 4½ percents, which we have a right to pay at par two or three years from now. They are, as I said, bearing 4½ percent. interest. Perhaps the premium on them is 6 or 8 per cent. now. It will naturally diminish as the time for payment approaches, but the 4½ per cent. interest that we will save by their purchase at this time with the money we have, which is now idle, and perhaps I might say worse than idle, will more than equalize the premium in the course of the two years we would have to pay the interest which we can stop by the purchase.

Knowing, therefore, that the contraction of the national-bank circulation must go on as we purchase the bonds now held as the basis of what still remains, the proposition I now make is only to require the Secretary to do what he is now authorized to do; it simply directs the Secretary to supply the currency necessarily withdrawn under these conditions with coin, silver coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870, which under all the decisions of the courts we have a right to use. The Attorney-General has so held, and the opinion of the Senator from Vermont, I am happy to say, is as strong and as clear in that regard as my own or that of any other gentleman. He has more than once asserted that we have a right to pay all our debts, public and private, with silver coin of that standard value. I seek to direct the Secretary of the Treasury, as this contraction will necessarily go on, not to allow any contraction of the existing volume of the currency, but to substitute it to the extent of the contraction with coin of the standard value prescribed by law, by going beyond the minimum where by law he is compelled to coin $2,000,000 a month. Of course the contraction of national-bank circulation will not progress with sufficient rapidity to exceed the maximum. I only propose to keep up the present circulating currency by coining the standard silver dollar in lieu of notes upon which certificates can be issued.

I desire to correct my statement as to the four-and-a-halfs held by the banks now. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] tells me that the amount of these bonds held as the basis of circulation and to secure deposits of Government funds is $85,000,000. Of course we will have to buy the great bulk or all of them before long, and all I desire is to furnish a substitute, so that there will be no contraction of the currency while this necessary process of buying bonds is going on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be that the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky may be exactly the happy issue out of all our afflictions; but I think a matter of so much importance, and that has so many different aspects to it, when it comes to be applied to the business affairs of the country, ought to be considered by a committee. That is the only point I make. I do not wish to contract the currency beyond the maximum that can possibly be used by legitimate business. I do not believe in having the currency so expanded that mere speculators and cranks, as you might say, in finance can borrow the surplus money of persons, or of banks, or of the United States, and go into speculations which are sure to turn out disastrously, because in the end it comes back on the laboring people of every country where that sort of thing goes on.

Therefore there is a point beyond which we ought not to go in having currency in circulation, in order to keep business steady, and to discourage unjust and mere kiting speculations. I suppose we all agree to that. We ought not to go below, in the quantity of our currency, the just and legitimate and generous needs of the business community of the United States, and by that I mean the whole body of its people who are honest and are willing to work in any kind of avocation. That is my proposition.

Now, that being so, a proposition of this character, which on the face of it may look very plausible indeed, may need to be considered in other aspects and bearings in such a way that it can not be considered until it is matured and reported upon by a committee. That is why we send bills to committees in the first instance, in order that the difficulties which may be suggested may be considered and a calm and sober judgment had of the subject under consideration.

Both the amendment of the Senator from Nevada and the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky embody very broad and in a considerable degree complicated propositions, the bearing of which in all their aspects can not be seen in a moment. My simple proposition is that all these matters should go to the Committee on Finance, of which the Senator from Kentucky is a member, in order that it may have time, briefly and diligently, to consider them and report a scheme which will relieve the difficulty that is said to exist, and relieve it in a way without any divisions by this aisle or any other divisions, and that we may all calmly agree to it as being a wise and prudent thing to do.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, I approve the suggestion offered by the Senator from Kentucky, and I think it would be wise to base whatever additional circulation we want to issue upon coin rather than upon any other basis, because of its being less liable to fluctuation. I do not propose to discuss that question now, but to discuss briefly an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill when it comes up, and which has been printed.

The object of my amendment is to make provisions that the $100,000,000 of gold coin now in the Treasury shall be used for the purpose of the redemption of the interest-bearing bonds of the country. It seems to me that that amendment is pertinent to the bill which we are considering, for the object of it is to reduce the surplus in the Treasury, and at the same time to reduce the debts of the country and to reduce the volume of interest which the people are required to pay on the public debt.

I wish to take a brief view of the financial policy which has controlled the action of the Government for many years under both the present and past administrations, from some features of which I totally dissent. The $100,000,000 in the Treasury is set apart under the provisions of an act declaring that the legal-tender notes of the Government should be redeemed by taking up 80 per cent. of the amount of the national-bank notes within a particular time until January, 1879. At that time the whole of the outstanding legal-tender notes were to be redeemed in coin, canceled, and taken out of circulation, thus reducing the volume of the currency in that respect, doubtless intended to be supplied by the addition of national-bank currency.

From the time of the passage of the act of February 25, 1862 (Laws, volume 12, page 345, section 1), the notes of the United States were a legal tender for all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due the United States, except duties on imports, and for all claims and demands against the United States, except for interest on the bonds and notes, which were to be paid in coin; and by that act they were made a legal tender for all debts, public and private, in the United States, except duties on imports and interest, as above stated. These provisions were re-enacted by the act of July 11, 1862 (section 1, Laws, volume 12, page 532); by the joint resolution of January 17, 1863 (Laws, volume 12, pages 822, 823), and by the act of March 3, 1863 (section 3, Laws, volume 12, pages 710, 711).

And the legal-tender quality of these notes as above specified has been upheld by numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. (See note to section 3588 of the Revised Statutes.) The gold coins and silver dollars of the United States were a legal tender for all sums and all debts and dues, public and private, down to the time of the passage of the act of February 12, 1873, "revising and amending the laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States." (Laws, volume 17, page 425.) The fifteenth section of that act provided for the coinage of trade dollars of 420 grains, and for the coinage of minor silver coins, and that they should be a legal tender for sums not exceeding $5. And the sixty-seventh section repealed all former coinage acts by which the coinage of the silver dollar was allowed in the mint.

By the second section of the act of June 14, 1875, "to provide for the resumption of specie payments," the charge of one-fifth of 1 per cent. for converting standard gold bullion into coin was repealed and the coinage of gold made free and unlimited. (Laws, volume 18, page 296.)

By the twenty-fifth section of the coinage act of February 12, 1873, the mints are to be paid for the preparation and coinage of silver whatever the Director of the Mint may regard as its just average cost. The Director of the Mint informs me that the cost of coining silver dollars at the New Orleans mint was for 1884 1.55 cents on the dollar and for 1885 was 1.49 cents per dollar, while the average cost of coinage at all the other mints per piece for those years was, respectively, 1.880 and 2.354 cents. But at these both gold and silver were coined.

By the act of February 12, 1873 (Laws, volume 17, page 425), gold was made the standard of values; and by the act of June 14, 1875, making the coinage of gold free, silver was placed at a discount as against gold of more than 1½ per cent; while by the act of February 12, 1873 (Laws, volume 17, page 425), about one-half the metal money of this country and of the world was by this law destroyed, the value of sureties about doubled, while the amount of property or labor necessary to pay a given debt was also about doubled. And thus the law of all the then subsisting contracts which involved credits was changed and violated for the benefit of the creditor and to the injury of the debtor.

By the act of March 18, 1869 (Laws, volume 16, page 1), "to strengthen the public credit," it was provided that—

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin, or its equivalent, of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

At the time of the passage of that act the public debt amounted, or rather on the 1st of July, 1869, to $2,588,452,213.94. And when this debt was created, except as to the interest on bonds, it was payable in gold and silver coin and in legal-tender notes. The amount of legal-tender notes in circulation January 1, 1869, was $355,892,975, and the Government, by the law under which the bonded debt was created, had the right to issue other legal-tenders in payment of these bonds. It has been estimated by persons competent to form correct conclusions on the subject that this act, by reducing the volume and kinds of money with which these bonds could be paid, and by increasing the relative value of the bonds as compared with the property and labor out of which they were to be paid, increased the value of those securities and the cost of their payment more than $500,000,000; that it put that much of a burden on the people for the benefit of the holders of those bonds.

Then by the act of 1873, to which I have referred (Laws, volume 17, page 425), silver was demonetized, and, as I have said, half the metal money of the world rendered useless for the payment of these bonds, and the value of the bonds and the burdens of the people about doubled. The debt on the 1st of July, 1873, was $2,234,482,993.20.

I am speaking of the amount of the debt at these dates, and the amount of the outstanding legal-tender notes, so that we may see the extent of the public credits which were affected by the passage of the laws to which I have referred, as well as the vast volume of corporate and private indebtedness which would be in the same way affected by it.

By the act of January 14, 1875 (Laws, volume 18, page 296), "to provide for the resumption of specie payments," it was provided in section 3 that the legal-tender notes in excess of $300,000,000 should be redeemed to the amount of 80 per cent. of the increase of national-bank notes, and that on and after the 1st day of January, 1879, the remaining $300,000,000 of legal-tender notes should be redeemed with coin.

Now, it is to be remembered that all these disastrously repressive measures of the Republican party, adopted in the interest of bondholders and the national banks—that is, the law of 1869 that the bonds of the United States should be paid in coin alone, the law of 1873 for the demonetization of silver, and the law of 1875 for the redemption of the legal-tender notes—were adopted when specie did not circulate in the United States, and that specie payments were not resumed until the fall of 1878, nine years after the passage of the first and three years after the passage of the last of these disastrous measures, during a period when there was but little specie in the country, and when it may be said specie did not circulate to any considerable extent. This reveals the folly and wickedness of the Republican financial policy.

Thus every political move thus far made was in the interest of the money power and against the interests of the Government and the people. And it has been repeatedly charged, and I think the charge is fully sustained, that these measures were the result of the improper influence of the bondholders of Europe and the United States and of the national banks in this country.

These measures brought about the great financial disasters of 1872 to 1877. During this period property of all kinds went down in value, labor was poorly rewarded, business of all kinds was paralyzed, bankruptcies were numerous all over the country, and there was not money enough in the country to carry on its business. Vast amounts of property in all parts of the country were sold for taxes because there was not money enough in the country to enable the people to pay their taxes, and this extended alike through the States from Maine to California. This was called by Republican doctors of finance getting down to "hardpan," and "hardpan" was the panacea they prescribed at that time for all our financial ills.

In the Forty-fourth Congress the Democrats had a majority in the House of Representatives for the first time since the Thirty-sixth Congress, and during that Congress they commenced the struggle for the remonetization of silver, and for the repeal of the law requiring the redemption and cancellation of the outstanding legal-tender notes; and during the Forty-fifth Congress the act of February 28, 1878 (Laws, volume 2, page 25), was passed, authorizing the coinage of not less than two millions nor more than four millions of silver monthly, and making it a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated, and authorizing the issuance of silver certificates on the silver coin in the Treasury, and these certificates were made receivable for customs dues, taxes, and all public dues.

And the Secretary of the Treasury (now Senator SHERMAN), in his official report of December, 1878, stated in substance, if I remember rightly, that the resumption of the coinage of silver had enabled the Government to resume specie payments.

During the same session of Congress, by the act of May 28, 1878 (Laws, volume 20, page 87), the act forbidding the further retirement of legal-tender notes was passed, and something over $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes were preserved to the people as a part of the volume of the currency necessary to carry on the business of the country, instead of being retired and made a part of its interest-bearing bonded debt as under the policy of the Republican party.

These two wholesome acts were passed over the veto of President Hayes and in the face of the clamorous prediction of bondholders and national bankers that they would bankrupt and ruin the country, and in the face of the denunciations of a hired press, charging those who voted for them as silver lunatics, as favoring rag-baby money, as demagogues, and by many other of the vilest epithets, and in the face of the threat of a panic which the banks tried to bring about as a means of defeating the passage of these measures by contracting the volume of the currency about $19,000,000 in a few weeks, and a panic would have been the result but for the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury put a considerable amount of money on the New York market for the purpose of buying up bonds and thus relieving the money market; so that the men controlling the national banks that had received so many favors from the Government and so many advantages for the benefit of the public as well as for themselves were willing to wreck the interests of this country in order to defeat a Government policy which they thought was not favorable to their own selfish interests.

I say that from the day they so acted, from the day they disregarded their duty to the public and defied the legislation of Congress, meant for the good of the people, in order to promote their own private gain, I have had a desire to see their charters expiring not renewed again. No set of institutions that have such power to expand or contract the volume of currency and that have displayed such a purpose as they have shown here at Washington and in their regular annual meetings to promote their selfish interests ought to be encouraged or sustained by the Government.

The result vindicated both the wisdom and the justice of the policy of the Democratic party in the restoration of a period of prosperity by the passage of these acts which still continues.

And that party, with the exception of a few misguided members of it, propose to secure a permanent continuance of prosperity which shall bless the people at large as well as benefit bankers, bondholders, and corporations in the end by preserving the volume of currency in some such plan as that indicated by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and by the free and unlimited coinage of silver in some such way as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] and by using the $100,000,000 of gold now locked up uselessly in the Treasury for the purchase and cancellation of 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds, and relieve the country of that much of the burden of debt and interest, and putting that large sum of money into active circulation to relieve the necessities of commerce, stimulate industry, and reward labor as proposed by my amendment, and by the substitution of coin certificates for gold certificates and silver certificates, as proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

In relation to the $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury, which has lain in the Treasury under the pretense that it was reserved to meet the legal-tender notes, I wish to make a further remark. By the act of 1878, which was passed over the veto of President Hayes, it was determined that the $346,000,000 of legal-tender notes then outstanding should form a part of the currency of the country, to aid in its business, and that it should not be taken up and canceled and converted into an interest-bearing bonded debt for the further oppression of the tax-payers of the country, and that that should not be done, as the national banks were acting in the bad faith then exhibited, so as to substitute their currency for the legal-tender notes. That act also prevented a contraction of the currency, which had been going on from 1869 down to that time, and which had involved the country for several years in apparently almost hopeless ruin.

In fact, the legal-tender notes were currency. It was the policy of Congress by the act of 1878 to support them as currency, and not treat them as a debt to be extinguished at the earliest opportunity by converting them into interest-bearing bonds. To-day they for commercial purposes are more valuable than the gold which is said to be held to redeem them. Nobody wants them to be redeemed, and I take it that everybody knows that it is an idle pretense to have that gold held in the Treasury for their redemption in view of the fact that the people prefer the notes to gold for commercial purposes, and having reference to the other fact that the receipts into the Treasury far exceed the expenditures, and the margin affords any reserve that might be necessary if we were disposed to regard this as a mere proposition for banking; for unfortunately, as it seems to me, for the country, we have become to regard the Treasury of the United States as a sort of banking institution for the general public, instead of one to furnish the means for the collection and disbursement of moneys necessary to carry on the Government.

If we wish to reduce the bonded debt, here is $100,000,000 of gold which may be expended in paying off the bonds and canceling them, and paying about $100,000,000 of the debt and saving us from the payment of 4 to 4½ per cent. interest a year; and the putting of that large amount of money in circulation to aid the business interests of the country would protect us securely against any threatened danger of financial panic. It would relieve us from that by placing the money in circulation, taking it from where it is useless, in the Treasury, and putting it in active use among the people.

Of all plans that have been suggested, it seems to me that this is the one which should be most readily accepted as the best means of reducing to that extent the bonded debt and of relieving the Treasury to that extent of a surplus. I know that this $100,000,000 is not regarded as part of the surplus, but it is as much a part of the surplus as any other money that lies useless in the Treasury. Until a government policy shall be adopted which shall determine that the legal-tenders are to be a bonded debt, this money can not be used as a reserve. No such reserve is necessary for the redemption of any greenbacks that may be brought in for redemption. Some of those notes may be brought in for redemption, but the amount is so small as to be entirely unimportant, and it can be met with other surplus revenues in the Treasury, and without interfering with public policy or endangering the security and value of the legal-tender notes.

I know a great deal has been said about the importance of preserving the credit and character of the Government securities. Mr. President, I desire to see the Government credit maintained; I desire to see its securities maintained at the highest standard; but I do not desire to see this done at the entire disregard of the interest of the people who by their labor and by their taxes have to support the Government. History will write it down that the policy of the Government from 1869 to now, so far as the executive department is concerned and so far as the laws were concerned up to 1878, have been distinctly a policy in the interest of the money lords of this country and of Europe, a policy distinctly at war with the best interests of the people of this country.

I know that the present Administration has taken up and maintained the policy of its Republican predecessors. I am a very good party man, but being a party man does not require me to sacrifice the interests of my country and be faithless to the duty I owe to those who sent me here. Remembering the duty I do owe so far as my action is concerned, without reference to what those in other and even higher places may do, I propose to stand by the interests of the people and insist upon their rights, and to insist that this Government shall be conducted in the interest of the people who support it, instead of in the interest of special classes who live by robbing both the Government and the people.

I have made these remarks more for the purpose and with the hope of calling attention to these acts and to their impolicy than in the hope of any present success in securing the adoption of my amendment. We are all perhaps sometimes led to forbear action by the chances of political success, which may depend on our yielding to the money power. If I had to acquire success by that means I think it would be my duty to retire from my present position. If I have to sacrifice the interests of the people for the benefit of men who have enjoyed special advantages and privileges of legislation, a policy so wrong as that to which I have alluded, I must say that I can not consent to follow such a policy. My hope is that the voice of the people may be heard, that the interests of the people may be considered, and that the policy which has so long prevailed may be reversed. And I say, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned as an individual, that I would rather be in a minority in the right, and be able to make a vigorous fight against the majority in the wrong, than to be in a divided party between right and wrong, apologizing for our position all the time.

Let the Democratic party strip itself for the fight and stand upon the rights of the people, not oppress any of them, not wrong any of them, not do injustice to any of them, whether bankers, bondholders, or others, but simply be just in the interest of the people, and let them know that that is its policy and its purpose, and I would venture the prediction of our sweeping the country in the next election by such a majority as has not been witnessed in this country in generations. The people desire party to represent them. I do not wish it to be understood that the great body of the Democracy do not represent the people, for it has been always the party of the people, but I do desire to be understood that there are members of it, and some of them in high position, who do not represent the interests of the people, who represent a policy at variance with their interests. I must speak the truth and not withhold it as a matter of policy. I propose to speak out the truth and to insist on a just policy, whatever the consequences may be to party or to persons.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him who it is in high position in the Democratic party that does not represent the interest of the people?

Mr. REAGAN. The Senator has been longer in the Senate than I have been. I do not propose to furnish a judgment for him which I suppose every man is capable of reaching himself.

Mr. BLAIR. Is the Senator willing to be specific?

Mr. REAGAN. I have been as specific as I think it is necessary to be when I state the principles of my action which I intend shall govern me, and when I have chosen to condemn those, whoever they may be, that do not stand by the interests of the people and of the Government, but do surrender to the money power from any fanciful notions or from moral cowardice. I wish, so far as I can, to direct public attention to this subject. I do not know that anything I may say will have much effect in that respect, but still I propose to do my duty in calling attention to what I believe to be a just policy in the interest of the people, and, so far as I am able to do so, to notify them that I propose to stand by their rights and by their interests and by the rights and interests of the Government of the United States as against the classes that have been permitted to use and plunder the Government and the people for the last fifteen or twenty years.

Mr. STEWART. I will withdraw my amendment to the motion to refer, and ask that the motion be voted down. I hope the bill will not be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada withdraws his motion to instruct.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance the Senator from Nevada asks that the yeas and nays be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It seems to me as though an agreement might be reached in the Senate simply to take the bill as reported from the Committee on Finance. I hope, therefore, that no amendment will be made.

Mr. TELLER. I inquire of the Senator what his side concede when that is done? Do they concede anything in voting for the bill as it came from the committee?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not suppose it is necessary to concede anything. It is a plain proposition.

Mr. TELLER. It can not be called an agreement then. We get nothing.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I took it for granted the Senator from Colorado and others were willing to vote for the bill as it came from the committee.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire if the Senator will agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], if he will yield so much as to put that on?

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have one amendment on the bill already.

Mr. TELLER. That is different. We are going to put this amendment in place of the other. Will that suit the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will answer the Senator by saying that I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is far less damaging, far less dangerous than that offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], or the one which, as I understand, has become a part of the bill, offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I consider the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky better than either of the others, but I propose to stand on the report of the Committee on Finance, and simply vote for the bill as they reported it.

Mr. CALL. I should be very glad for one to have this question discussed at some length. It seems to me to be entirely clear that this proposition of the Committee on Finance to invest the $150,000,000 or perhaps $200,000,000 in a particular kind of property, in the purchase of the bonds in the public debt, may result in a very large addition to the amount to be paid by the tax-payers to that class of property-holders. I think it very clear that there ought to be an authority in the President or Secretary of the Treasury to purchase these bonds.

Whether or not it should be declared to be the policy of the Government to invest the whole surplus now in the Treasury and that which is to accrue, as fast as it accrues, in paying any premium that may be demanded on these bonds, is a very different question, whether or not that policy shall be declared by Congress to the bondholders as the established policy for the use of all the surplus money that shall be derived from taxation without any provision for the benefit of the tax-payers, and leaving to chance the distribution of this money in the channels of business, may be a question worthy of consideration.

I am not satisfied that there is not force in the suggestions made by the Senator from Nevada in regard to the basis of the currency of this country, whether or not the market value of the precious metals may not be made available as the basis of a sound currency and to what extent restrictions are necessary to be placed on the amount of circulation. Prophesies—bold assertions of consequences to accrue—are not arguments. I should like to hear something in the nature of argument in place of mere statements of opinion and the reiteration of inconsequential facts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would the Senator from Florida yield to me to move for an executive session? It is very desirable to have an executive session.

Mr. CALL. I yield with pleasure. I have no set speech to make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive busines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And also that of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following amendment, intended to be proposed by him as additional sections; which was ordered to be printed:

SEC. —. That any person may deposit at any mint or assay office of the United States either gold or silver bullion, or both, in quantities of not less than 5 ounces of gold or 80 ounces of silver, and demand and receive coin certificates therefor. The price to be paid for such bullion, in exchange for certificates, shall be stated by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st and 15th day of each calendar month, and when either of these days shall fall on Sunday or any other holiday, such statement shall be made on the following secular day, and the price so stated shall be equal to the average quotations of such bullion in the New York City market during the fifteen days next preceding such statement: Provided, That the price stated by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed $1 of such certificates for 25.8 grains, troy weight, of gold, nine-tenths fine, nor $1 of like certificates for 412½ grains, troy weight, of silver, nine-tenths fine. Bullion below the standard fineness deposited under the provisions of this section may be reduced to the required fineness at the several mints and assay offices of the United States, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at the same cost to the depositor as is now charged for reducing gold bullion to the standard required for coinage.

SEC. —. That the coin certificates issued under the provisions of this act shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That they shall not be of less denomination than $1 or more than $1,000, and that one-half of the amount issued shall be of denominations less than $50, and shall be redeemable in gold or silver coin at the option of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be coined from time to time such portion of the bullion deposited under the provisions of this act as may be necessary to enable him to furnish coin for the redemption of such certificates. All coin certificates issued under the provisions of this act shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in contracts heretofore made.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MILLS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCKINLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the committee.

Mr. MCMILLIN. After conference with members of the Ways and Means Committee I am requested to announce to the House that we will seek to take up for consideration the bill just reported on two weeks from to-morrow—Tuesday, the 17th instant. We have thus set the date forward for the purpose of enabling the Appropriation Committees to get their bills into the Senate as far as may be; and we trust that at that date the business of the House in this respect will be so disposed of that we can have an unobstructed way.

DUTIES PAID BY THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1692) to refund duties paid by the State of New York on arms imported in 1863.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be also read subject to the right to object.

The report was read at length.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the consideration of this bill; but if leave is given to consider it I desire to be heard for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I object, unless we can have an opportunity to discuss it fully.

BRIG TALLY HO.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6757) to refer the claim of the owners of the brig Tally Ho to the Court of Claims.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report of the Committee on Claims was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. I should like to hear some explanation.

Mr. HAYDEN. This is a very simple matter. The United States steam-vessel of war Pinta, running off the coast of Massachusetts, ran into the sailing brig Tally Ho, and sunk her. On an examination ordered by the Navy Department the court of inquiry decided the naval officers were at fault; and the case was referred by the Secretary of the Navy to the Court of Claims. Under the decision of the Court of Claims in the Abbie Pitman case it was determined that in cases of collision the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction. Consequently the case would be dismissed from the Court of Claims. The testimony has been taken on both sides—on the part of the Government and on the part of the owners; and now we ask that the case may be permitted to be adjudicated in the Court of Claims, and that the testimony taken so far may be used in the case, so that no more expense shall be put on the owner.

It is a simple case of collision, in which a United States steam man-of-war ran into a sailing vessel.

Mr. McMILLIN. What has been the custom heretofore in cases of this kind?

Mr. HAYDEN. Such cases had to come to Congress and be sent by Congress to the Court of Claims. It was necessary to get permission from Congress in order that they might be sent there.

Mr. McMILLIN. As I understand, this is not like a case under the Bowman act, where the Court of Claims makes a return to Congress of the findings of fact, but the case is to go to the court for judgment.

Mr. HAYDEN. And why should it not go to judgment there? This is a case in which the Navy Department, a branch of the United States Government, confesses its agents were at fault. Now, if the Court of Claims decides that is true and the amount of loss is fixed, why should not the case go to final judgment there?

Mr. McMILLIN. Does not this involve the same question as was involved in the case of Bunton, on the Ohio River, of the responsibility of the Government for the acts of its officers?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not know. I am not enough of a lawyer to answer that question.

Mr. McMILLIN. I should like time to look into the question.

Mr. HAYDEN. After judgment by the Court of Claims the case will come back here for an appropriation.

Mr. McMILLIN. It may come back for an appropriation, but Congress will then have no control over it. You do not, as under the Bowman act, reserve authority to Congress to give the final decision, but you give the Court of Claims absolute authority to render judgment in the premises.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask the gentleman if there is any equity or justice in refusing to let the case go to the Court of Claims when the Navy authorities have recognized that they were liable in this matter and have confessed judgment as far as they can confess judgment, and ask to have the thing go into court and be decided? Why should it not be decided there in equity?

Mr. McMILLIN. The point I am trying to get at is whether this is the same question that was involved in the case of the Ohio River. If so, I can not give my consent to this case taking one step forward, because I think the course taken in the other case by Congress was wrong. For the present, until I see there is some merit in it, I will have to object.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee to object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Pacific Railroads. I report back three bills with the recommendation that they be laid upon the table, and a substitute, which I ask to have printed and recommitted.

The substitute, a bill (H. R. 9052) to forfeit lands granted to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes, was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. There are three bills sent up.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire them to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. The other bill can not be a substitute for three bills. The gentleman can report an original bill in lieu of all these bills.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is what I desire to do.

The following bills were laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. 1302) forfeiting certain lands granted to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California by section 18 of the act of Congress approved January 27, 1866; rates imposed by common carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers and property from one State, Territory, or District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or District of Columbia; and

Whereas the commission created under said act has for some time past exercised the authority and functions conferred by the provisions of said act; and

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ISLAND POND, VT.

Mr. GROUT introduced a bill (H. R. 9087) for the erection of a public building at Island Pond, Vt.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

REBELLION RECORDS.

Mr. GROSVENOR submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and it is hereby, directed, in addition to the inquiry it is now prosecuting in relation to the publication of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, to inquire and report in regard to the feasibility and advisability of completing the publication of these records under the supervision and control of a joint committee of Congress.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed:

Whereas "Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the senate and house of commons of Canada," did by due statutory enactment assented to May 15, 1879, provide that "any or all of the following articles, that is to say, animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables, including potatoes and other roots; plants, trees, and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, and all other grain; flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain; butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted, or smoked), and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this act, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada;" and

Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled did, by act approved March 3, 1883, duly provide that plants, trees, shrubs, and vines of all kinds, and seeds of all kinds, fresh fish, fruits, green, ripe, or dried, eggs, and a large number of articles specifically named should be admitted into the United States free of duty; in consequence whereof it appears that large quantities of plants, trees, shrubs, vines, and seeds, eggs, aggregating in value in the year 1885 $1,831,000; in the year 1886, $1,728,000; in the year 1887, $1,827,060, and great quantities of fish and other products of the Dominion of Canada have been imported into the United States duty free, while that government has neglected, failed, and refused to keep or observe Her Majesty's standing offer of reciprocity, in respect of the articles specified, or of many of them, and have, as is alleged, exacted large sums by way of duty upon many of the articles specified, which have been imported into Canada from the United States; and have, as is alleged, levied and assessed ad valorem duties upon American goods at the actual retail price or value at which such goods are sold for home consumption even when shipped, imported, and sold in large quantities at wholesale prices notwithstanding and in disregard and violation of the spirit and letter of the Canadian statutes; and

Whereas it is claimed on the part of Canadian officials that the citizens of the United States can avail themselves of the privileges of reciprocity under the act first above quoted only after all the articles therein specified shall be admitted free of duty by United States laws: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report as speedily as practicable to this House the kinds and quantities of goods and products imported into the United States from Canada free of duty during the past five years, and also the quantities of similar goods and products exported from the United States into Canada during the same period, together with a statement in detail, showing the amount of duties, specified and ad valorem paid thereon, to the end and purpose of ultimate recovery thereof, and of an adjustment of the differences resulting from such breach of faith on the part of the Canadian Government.

Resolved, further, That the Committee on Ways and Means report to the House within ten days a bill providing:

First. For an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. upon all plants, trees, shrubs, and vines of all kinds imported into the United States from the Dominion of Canada.

Second. For a specific duty of 5 cents per dozen upon eggs so imported.

Third. For a specific duty of 1 cent a pound upon all fish so imported.

Fourth. That in all cases a duty shall be imposed upon all goods and products now on the free-list whenever similar goods and products are subject to duty under the laws of Canada, at a rate equal to that imposed thereunder.

Fifth. That ad valorem duties imposed by the laws of the United States on goods, wares, and merchandise imported from foreign countries shall be assessed upon the actual retail price or value at which such goods are sold for home consumption in the country of production or export, whenever in the country of such production or export ad valorem duties upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported into such country from the United States are assessed upon the retail price or value at which such goods are sold for home consumption in the United States.

TERMS OF PRESIDENT, MEMBERS OF CONGRESS, ETC.

Mr. CRAIN. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House pass the joint resolution (H. Res. 120) proposing amendments to the Constitution, changing the time for the commencement and limitation of the terms of the President, Vice-President, and members of Congress, and altering the date of the annual meeting of Congress.

Mr. ADAMS and Mr. BURROWS demanded a second.

Mr. CRAIN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). Before that question is submitted the Chair directs the Clerk to report the resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, namely:

ARTICLE —.

The term of office of the President shall continue until the 30th day of April, in the year 1889, at noon, and the 30th day of April, at noon, shall thereafter be substituted for the 4th day of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of the President and Vice-President.

The twelfth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States shall be amended by striking out the words "4th day of March," and substituting instead thereof the words "30th day in April, at noon."

ARTICLE —.

The 31st day of December, at noon, is substituted for the 4th day of March as the commencement and termination of the official term of the Senators and of the members of the House of Representatives.

The Congress in existence when the members of the first House of Representatives are elected after the ratification of this amendment shall hold no annual session after such election, and its term of office shall expire on the 31st day of the following December.

The Senators whose existing term would otherwise expire on the 4th day of March next succeeding the day on which the term of the first Congress shall commence after the ratification of this amendment, shall continue in office until their successors are appointed or elected.

Congress shall assemble at least once in each year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in January, unless Congress shall by law appoint a different day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] demands a second. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. On a proposition of so much importance as that of changing the Constitution in two particulars I prefer to take the sense of the House, whether the House proposes to dispose of this in thirty minutes. I therefore object to the second being considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed Mr. ADAMS and Mr. CRAIN as tellers.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 110, noes 57.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the proposition and fifteen minutes in opposition to it. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] to control the time in support of the motion, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. CRAIN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS].

Mr. COLLINS. The House will remember that a few weeks ago a constitutional amendment in another form with regard to the terms of the President, Vice-President, and members of Congress was under discussion, and failed of securing the necessary two-thirds vote, partly because of the brilliant and vigorous opposition to it by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], and partly because a large number of the members of the House did not desire to extend for some two months their present term of office.

I contended for the passage of that resolution with what little ability I had, mainly because it met partly at least the present difficulties, and would in all probability, having passed the Senate, receive the ratification of the requisite number of States during this year and thus affect the Fifty-first Congress.

This amendment, I am bound to say, is not only in its essential features as good as that amendment as far as it goes, but is also much better, because broader. It provides the term of the President and Vice-President shall begin and end on the 30th of April once in four years. It provides that the terms of members of Congress, instead of ending on the 4th of March, shall end on the 31st of December; and in addition to that, that the Congress elected when this becomes a part of the organic law of the country shall take their seats early in the January succeeding the date of their election. Therefore I trust the amendment will receive the necessary two-thirds vote of the House.

Mr. CRAIN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. I congratulate the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Massachusetts upon their harmony in producing a measure which in our last debate on this topic it was suggested might be done by a conference between these gentlemen, who then disagreed.

I favor this amendment to the Constitution. My reason is simple. It can be stated in less than my two minutes. I would have the Representative in touch with the people. The Representative is not, in fact, a representative, but is a mis-representative, unless he comes fresh from the people as the exponent of the popular sentiment and policy. Owing to the vicissitudes of our politics and its changes, even its whims and caprices, it is necessary in a republic that there should be a change made in the organic law, to be submitted, according to the constitutional provisions, to the States or to the people, so as to effectuate this representative nearness to the people. We are here the representatives of a democratic republic. It is a republic based on the will of the people as the last resort. The people are represented in this, the popular body, and I would forget all other considerations and ignore all other obstacles to secure this great end provided for in the amendment proposed by the gentleman.

Mr. CRAIN. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ADAMS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. BURROWS. Thirty minutes is a very brief time to consider a proposition to amend the Constitution in two important particulars. Heretofore the term of the President has commenced on the 4th of March, and the term of a member of Congress has commenced at the same time. This was fixed by the Continental Congress at the beginning of the Government. It is now proposed to change this and have the Presidential term begin on the 30th day of April and the Congressional term on the first Monday in January; so that the day fixed in the beginning for the inauguration of the National Government shall be abandoned and another day substituted.

Let us consider for a moment the practical effect of this resolution if it be made a part of the Constitution.

To illustrate. Let us suppose that the proposed amendment is ratified by the requisite number of States during the coming summer, what will be the effect? The effect will be to make this the last session of the Fiftieth Congress, and no member of this body will be called upon to attend a December session, for there will be none. The Fifty-first Congress will come in on the first Monday in January next. This results in cutting off two months of membership in this Congress with the necessary loss of pay [laughter], while the Presidential term is to be extended from the 4th of March until the 30th of April. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] suggests that this is a wise provision, because if the party in power is repudiated at the November election, then the existing Congress ought not to hold another session, but the new Congress should come in as representing the recently expressed sentiment of the people.

But the joint resolution at the same time provides that the Presidential term shall be extended, although the people may have repudiated the President as well as Congress at the same election. The Representatives of the people are to meet in session immediately at the beginning of the new year, but the Presidential term is to be extended until the 30th day of April and the repudiated President remain in power. And this, forsooth, because the first President happened to be inaugurated on the 30th day of April, 1789, although all the other Presidents during a century have been inaugurated on the 4th day of March. It was a mere accident that Washington was inaugurated on the 30th of April, and I submit that we ought not to amend our Constitution to make it conform to what was an accident in the beginning and thus obliterate that historic day, the 4th of March, when the machinery of our National Government went into operation.

Another objection to this proposed amendment is that it gives us two long sessions of Congress instead of one short and one long one. For instance, if the Constitution should be amended in conformity with this resolution before the next November election, then the Fifty-first Congress will meet on the 1st of January, 1889, and the session will run necessarily until July or August. Then the second session will begin on the first Monday in the succeeding January, and that also will be a long session. Thus two long sessions will be held, which will be prolonged into the summer months, to the discomfort of every one. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the reasons assigned for this proposed amendment ought not to prevail with the House. I can see no advantage to be derived from it. Some have suggested as a reason for the change that the 4th of March is an inclement season for the inauguration of a President. I have yet to learn of a single President who has declined to be inaugurated on that day on account of the weather. [Laughter.] With equal propriety you might as well propose to change the celebration of the 4th of July to some day in October because it would be a more comfortable season.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, if this amendment is ratified it can not take effect to change the terms of the members of the Fiftieth Congress. It can only relate, even if promptly ratified, to the Congress to be elected next November.

A MEMBER. Why do you not put that in the joint resolution then?

Mr. SPRINGER. I say that in the very nature of things it can not be ratified until after the time of this Congress shall have expired. I have in my hands a list of the dates of the meetings of the Legislatures of the several States, from which it appears that it is impossible for this amendment to be ratified during the sessions which will be held in the beginning of the year 1889. It could be ratified only in the very improbable contingency of the governors of three-fourths of the States calling extra sessions of the State Legislatures for that purpose. So that, in the natural course of events in this country, this amendment, even if acceptable to three-fourths of the States, will apply only to the members of Congress who are elected in November next, and to the President who is elected at that time.

As a matter of comfort and convenience members will certainly agree, I think, that the weather on and about the 4th of March is apt to be very inclement. Certainly it would have been extremely inconvenient and disagreeable to have had an inauguration on that day this year.

Mr. ADAMS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this seems to be largely a question of weather. I know of no one except the newspapers and people of this District who are asking for this change, and it is put expressly upon the ground of having better weather for inauguration. Now, as a matter of safety, the 4th of March is better than the 30th of April, because in this climate, where the weather changes twenty-four times in each twenty-four hours, people coming here for the inauguration on the 4th of March will come prepared for anything, but if it is put off until the 30th of April they will come wearing their thin clothing, and, as a result, two-thirds of them will probably die from exposure. [Laughter.] Hence, from that standpoint, I do not think it is safe to change the Constitution of the United States.

Again, Mr. Speaker, and seriously, the point made that a man coming here as a Representative should come fresh from the people is not a good one. A member coming to the Congress of the United States for the first time, if he has any due conception of the responsibilities of his position, needs, for his own sake and the country's, about thirteen months of good hard work preparing himself for the special work of the place to which the people have called him, and, as a matter of fact, our fathers were wiser than we shall be if we adopt this amendment when they arranged the matter so that before coming here and assuming the duties of a Representative of the people a member-elect should have time and opportunity to prepare himself for the new field.

It is one of the wisest arrangements in our system that the Representative is not allowed to come here and deliberate, act, and vote until he has had time to study up those questions that he ought to be familiar with, including the rules of order of this House, which it will take ten times thirteen months for any ordinary man to understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAIN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the proposition embodied in the constitutional amendment now under discussion, establishing the time when the terms of Congress shall begin and end and when Congress shall meet, is by no means new.

In one form or another it has been advanced many times since the adoption of our Constitution, and has been the subject of much formal and informal discussion in and out of Congress, by legislators, by the press, and by students of our institutions of government.

During the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, several years before my friend from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] was first elected to Congress, I myself introduced a bill relating thereto, known as H. R. 7376, Forty-seventh Congress, second session, and entitled "A bill establishing the time when the terms of Congress shall begin and end and when Congress shall meet." This bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

No action having been taken on it by that Congress, I reintroduced the bill, with the necessary changes as to dates, in the Forty-eighth Congress (H. R. 679). The Committee on the Judiciary, to which it was referred, appointed a subcommittee on the bill, composed of Messrs. Hammond, SENEY, and REED, but no definite action was had. I reintroduced it again, with the necessary change of dates, in the Forty-ninth Congress (H. R. 952), but that Congress, too, failed to take action.

I, thereupon, introduced it in the present Congress (H. R. 1478), again altering the dates to suit the later time.

The bill as introduced in this Congress is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for holding elections for Representatives and Delegates to Congress shall remain as now fixed in section 25 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; but so much of said section 25 of said Revised Statutes as indicates when the Congress is to commence is hereby repealed.

SEC. 2. That the first regular meeting or session of the Fifty-first Congress shall commence on the 5th day of March, 1889, instead of on the first Monday in December, 1889, and no regular session of said Congress shall begin on said first Monday in December, 1891.

SEC. 3. That the second regular meeting or session of the Fifty-first Congress shall commence on the second Monday in January, 1890; and the term of said Fifty-first Congress shall end at 12 o'clock meridian on the 1st day of December, 1890.

SEC. 4. That the term of the Fifty-second Congress shall begin at 12 o'clock meridian on the first day in December, 1890, and end at 12 o'clock meridian on the first day in December, 1892; and thereafter, until otherwise directed by law, the term of each succeeding Congress shall begin at 12 o'clock meridian on the first day in December after each election for Representatives and Delegates in Congress, and end at the same hour on the first day of the second December after the beginning of the term aforesaid.

SEC. 5. That the first regular meeting or session of the Fifty-second Congress shall commence at 12 o'clock meridian on the first Monday in December, 1890, and the second at the same hour on the first Monday in December, 1891; and thereafter, until otherwise directed by law, the regular meeting or session of Congress shall commence at 12 o'clock meridian on the first Monday in each December.

SEC. 6. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

It will be seen that this bill covers the ideas embodied in the constitutional amendment now under consideration (except as to the change of date for the inauguration of President), besides being much fuller in the elaboration of those ideas and in the provision of detail necessary to carry them into effect.

Whether it requires a constitutional amendment to give efficacy to the same is a mooted question. Lawyers, even on the Judiciary Committee of this House, differ as to that. The only doubt is as to the abridgment by statute of the term of a Congress. That a day different from "the first Monday in December" for the meeting of Congress may be appointed by law is not denied by any one. The authority is expressly given in the Constitution.

And on the proposition of the abridgment by law of the term of a Congress, without going into a legal or constitutional argument to sustain the same, or even insisting that it is sustainable, I will merely remark that the Constitution nowhere says directly that the term of Congress shall be for two years. It merely declares, on that point, that the "House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States;" and it appears obviously true that the term of a Congress may be shortened and yet fulfill the constitutional requirement of election in the "second year."

But, Mr. Speaker, whether the object we have in mind, the end we have in view, in respect to this matter, may be better attained by constitutional amendment or by statute, is not what I rose to discuss.

My purpose was and is to add a few observations on the merits of the proposition. I heartily favor it. It should have been adopted long ago. It does away with an anomaly which exists in our institutions. It is the boast of Englishmen that their political system brings the government nearer to the people than ours. And there is, sir, some basis for the claim. With them Parliament meets very soon after the election of its members, and if the ministry, which represents the executive power, is not supported by Parliament, it resigns, or appeals to the country by a dissolution and new election.

It is obvious that in this way the popular will is executed with but little delay. But with us the anomaly, and, from the representative point of view, the absurdity, is often presented of Representatives or a political party beaten at the polls assembling to make laws for the country. "And," says a writer on this subject, "as the House of Representatives is elected in November and does not generally meet until a year from the following December, it may happen that a House may be discredited before it has entered upon its duties by the result of the State elections in the autumn following its own election." Thus it often occurs that what is accepted as true under our form of Government is actually false, namely, that the members of the lower House of Congress are the immediate representatives of the people. Instead of being "the popular branch," as it is wont to be termed, of the National Legislative Assembly it sometimes happens that it is "unpopular" in the sense that it represents the minority sentiment of the people as ascertained by the result of State elections subsequent to its own.

This peculiarity of our system is a great inconvenience, if not injury, to the public service. It is in the way of a prompt response of legislation to the changes of public sentiment. It is inconsistent with "the rule of the people" in the sense as embodied in the proud boast, so dear to all Americans, that ours is a government "of the people, for the people, and by the people," for the long delay now imposed between the election of a Congress and its induction into office tends to defeat the will of the majority. The zeal of members for issues which carried them into power is likely to abate somewhat in thirteen months, and this lapse gives the interested opponents of proposed reforms ample time to prepare for effective work. Experience has shown that there is nothing gained and much risked by the long delay between the election of a Representative and the beginning of his duties.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, our present time for the meeting of Congress leaves the country without an organized Congress—so far as relates to the House of Representatives—for nine months at a time every two years, making an aggregate of three-eighths of the time. The Speaker of the House of Representatives is a personage in the line of Presidential succession. It is not prudent to have this office vacated for nine months of every alternate year.

Again, sir, another sound reason for the proposed change is that it would enable each Congress to have two long sessions, instead of one long and one short session, as now. Our country has become so great, its people so numerous, its affairs so multitudinous, its concerns so varied, its interests so diversified, and these all the time increasing, that the time is not far distant when Congress must needs sit seven or eight months every year in order to the proper and seemly transaction of the legislative business of the country.

The measure under consideration addresses itself to the common sense of the people, and will, I have no doubt, receive their cordial approval and indorsement.

Mr. ADAMS. The pending resolution for an amendment to the Constitution contains two distinct articles. The first postpones the beginning of the Presidential term from March 4 to April 30. The second article relates to the Congressional term. It changes the date of the beginning of the term from March 4 to January 1, and provides that there shall be a meeting of Congress on the first day of the term.

As to the first article, relating to the beginning of the Presidential term, I shall have little to say. When this proposition came before the House a few weeks ago, coupled as it then was with a proposition to extend the Congressional term to the same date of the 30th of April, it had an esthetic and a sentimental side as well as a practical side. It postponed inauguration day till a pleasanter season of the year; that was esthetics. It postponed inauguration day to the day on which Washington happened to be inaugurated; that was the sentimental side of the proposition. It also added about two months to the short session of Congress; that was its practical side. As the proposition comes before us to-day it has lost the practical feature which it had before, and with it has lost, in my judgment, all claim to favorable consideration. There is perhaps some slight historical interest attached to the date of the 30th of April by reason of the fact that Washington happened to be inaugurated on that day. Washington did not choose the day, however. Doubtless he would have chosen an earlier date, for he was a prompt and orderly man of affairs, and he ought to have been and was ready to be inaugurated long before the 30th of April. Nor was the 30th of April selected by the deliberate judgment of Congress as the proper day for inaugurating the President. If the Senators and Members of the First Congress had been as diligent in the performance of public duty as Washington and Adams were, the electoral votes would have been counted on the 4th day of March, and the President and Vice-President would have been inaugurated soon afterwards.

But when the 4th of March arrived there was not a quorum present in either House of Congress. The House waited for a quorum till April 1, the Senate till April 6. Then the votes were counted, and special messengers were dispatched to inform Washington in Virginia and Adams in Massachusetts of their election as President and Vice-President. They started immediately for New York, then the seat of government. We are told that Washington was anxious to arrive as soon as possible in order that the new government might be set in operation with the least possible delay. He was delayed by the throngs of people who wished to do him homage by the way. He did not arrive till April 26. Adams had been sworn in as Vice-President some days before. Whatever historical interest may attach to the exceptional and accidental date of Washington's inauguration, it does not justify Congress in proposing to the Legislatures of the several States to change the Constitution in the manner proposed in this resolutions. If Washington were here in person to advise us, we know enough of his character to know what advice he would give us. He would doubtless say that the interval between the election of a President and his inauguration into office is long enough now and ought not to be extended for a merely sentimental reason. The President and the new Congress are elected on the same day; for the choice by the electoral college has come to be a mere ceremony. They should go into office on the same day. Both Houses of Congress should be in session on the 4th day of March. The President should deliver his inaugural address in the presence of the two Houses. His address should be immediately referred to the proper committees of each House for appropriate action. All parts of the new governmental machinery should be put in motion at the same time.

Such a ceremonial, simple and practical as it would be, though it might be less attractive to the sight-seers of Washington than the outdoor pageants of to-day, would be far more impressive to the right-thinking people of the United States.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak mainly of the second part of the pending proposition, which fixes January 1 instead of March 4 as the beginning of the terms of Senators and Members of Congress. That at least is its evident purpose. I think I can see some ambiguity in that part of the proposition which relates to existing terms of Senators. It provides that certain existing terms of Senators shall be extended till the election or appointment of their successors. According to this provision, taken by itself, the term of the successor would begin on the day of his election. It would run for six years from that day. Senators are not always elected on the same day of the year, and never, except by accident, on the 1st day of January, the day on which, according to another provision of the pending proposition, all Senatorial terms are to begin. There is, I think, a defect in the wording of the proposition which will require change. It may be said that the language can be amended in the Senate or in a conference committee, and so it can. But I think it unworthy of this House to send to the Senate a proposition for an amendment to the Constitution unless it expresses the deliberate judgment of this House as clearly as this House is capable of expressing it.

But, Mr. Speaker, I can not dwell on a mere question of expression. I will say, however, that we ought to refuse to suspend the rules and pass the resolution to-day, in order that it may come up again at a time when questions relating to the form as well as to the substance of the proposed amendment to the Constitution can be deliberately considered. To defeat the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution does not finally defeat the main proposition. It only postpones it till it can be duly considered and amended if need be.

Now I desire to speak to the main proposition, to amend the Constitution so as to provide that the Senatorial and Congressional term shall begin on the 1st day of January instead of the 4th day of March, and to state my objections to the proposed change. I will not notice, except in passing, the obvious inconsistency, already alluded to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], between the first and the second article, both of which we are now asked to submit to the State Legislatures by one and the same vote. It does seem to me surprising that when President and Congressmen are now elected at the same time and come into office on the same day, four months thereafter, we should be asked by one and the same vote to extend this interval in the case of the President and reduce it in the case of the Congressmen. It occurs to me that the same reasoning applies to both cases and that the arguments which are adduced in favor of the second proposition are valid arguments against the first. But I have not time to dwell on that.

I am opposed to amending the Constitution in order to change the beginning of the Congressional term from March 4 to January 1 for two reasons:

First, all, or nearly all, of the advantages which could result from adopting this amendment to the Constitution can be secured by an act of Congress without amending the Constitution at all.

Secondly, the proposed change is fraught with inconvenience, and, as I think, with danger in its bearing on the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

What are the existing evils which it is sought to cure by the proposed amendment of the Constitution?

First, there is the interval of thirteen months alluded to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] between the election of a member of Congress and the day on which he actually enters on his legislative duties. We can cure this evil by an act of Congress.

Secondly, some gentlemen think it an evil that members of Congress are allowed to legislate after their successors are elected. I do not think it a serious evil; but if it is, we can cure this, too, by an act of Congress, without amending the Constitution.

Thirdly, some gentlemen think it an evil that the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President is intrusted to a Congress elected two years before instead of intrusting it to the newly-elected Congress. I admit that we can not change this without changing the Constitution; but far from regarding it as desirable, I believe that there would be serious danger in leaving the duty of counting the electoral votes to a Congress elected at the same time with the electors where votes are to be counted.

First, I say we can by an act of Congress reduce the long interval between the election of members of Congress and the beginning of their legislative duties. We can provide that Congress shall meet on the first day of its term; that is, on the 4th day of March. Congress thus assembled on the first day of its term could either sit for a few days to complete its organization, or it could proceed at once to its regular legislative work.

If Congress sat only for a day or two, just long enough to elect its Speaker and other officers, and then adjourned to the regular December session, a great advantage would have been gained. The Speaker could during the recess choose the standing committees of the House and announce them on the first day of the December session. This would save three or four weeks now wasted at the beginning of the long session.

If Congress were to sit for a few weeks after the 4th day of March, till the standing committees could be announced, and bills could be introduced and referred, a still further advantage would be gained. Each member, knowing beforehand what committee work he would be called on to perform at the long session, could prepare himself for that work during the recess. The House would go to work as a fully organized body on the first day of the December session, and could accomplish more by the 1st day of May than it now accomplishes by the 1st day of July. Congress could do more than this at the spring session. It could pass bills which had failed at the preceding Congress for lack of time. Instead of adjourning till December it could take a recess till October if the exigencies of public business required. It could then sit from October till May or from October till July if it chose, and could, by means of a short preliminary session at the beginning of its term, accomplish far more work with less inconvenience than can possibly be accomplished under the present system.

But, Mr. Speaker, in order to compare the sessions of Congress as they could be rearranged by an act of Congress without an amendment of the Constitution with the sessions as they would be rearranged under the proposed amendment, I will consider the first session, beginning on the first day of the term, as a regular session, lasting till July at least, in which the annual appropriation bills could be passed and the work of general legislation entered upon. What would be the difference between the two plans? What advantage would the plan which required an amendment of the Constitution have over the other plan? It would simply be a difference of two months. In the one case the session would begin January 1, in the other it would begin March 4; that is all. Surely it is not worth while to amend the Constitution to secure an advantage so slight as that. It will be observed that in making this comparison I leave out of view altogether the session at the end of the Congressional term, which we now know as the short session.

I do this because one of the objects of the proposed constitutional amendment is said to be to abolish that short session, held after the election for the succeeding House has been held. I see no necessity for abolishing the short session. The notion that a House of Representatives can not be trusted to legislate for the country after the succeeding House has been elected is a fanciful one. The new House is largely composed of the same members as the last. Members of Congress rarely fail of re-election because of neglect or incapacity. Some retire voluntarily. Some are retired for lack of personal popularity or because of the greater popularity of some one else. In the vast majority of cases members are as useful, as diligent, as trustworthy in their last session as in their first. The same rule would apply to executive officers as to members of a legislative body. Did Grant cease to be trustworthy from the day that Hayes was nominated? Did Arthur cease to be trustworthy on the day when his hopes of a nomination failed? If the present Executive were to-day or to-morrow to come across his letter of acceptance written four years ago, and were to decide that he could not consistently with that letter become a candidate again, would it follow that he would not hereafter execute to the best of his ability the duties of his office for the remainder of his term? [Laughter.]

But after all, if it is really necessary to abolish the short legislative session at the end of the term, we can do it by act of Congress without amending the Constitution. The Constitution provides that the annual meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day. If we appoint by law the 4th day of March as the day for the annual meeting of Congress, the December session as we now know it would cease to exist. In that case Congress, adjourning sine die in July, at the end of the long session, would not come together at all after the fall elections, except once in four years, when, by force of section 142 of the Revised Statutes, it would be in session on the second Wednesday in February for the purpose of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

Congress would thus have two legislative sessions in each term: First, the short session at the beginning of the term and lasting as long as Congress chose to sit, and, secondly, the second session, beginning in October, November, December, or January, as each Congress might prefer, and terminating whenever the two Houses chose to adjourn sine die. Thus all of the substantial advantages promised by the proposed constitutional amendment could be secured by an act of Congress without amending the Constitution at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the last and most serious objection to the proposed amendment of the Constitution. If that amendment were adopted, the electoral votes for President and Vice-President would be counted by a newly-elected House before the contested-election cases pending in it could possibly be decided. The average date of the general election of members of the House is the 5th of November. The State canvassing boards can hardly issue the certificates of election before the 25th day of the month. The existing law allows a contestant thirty days from the issue of the certificate to serve on the contestee the notice of contest, specifying the grounds on which the contest is made. The contestee has thirty days from the receipt of this notice to prepare his answer and serve it on the contestant. From the day on which the answer of the contestee is served on the contestant the parties have ninety days in which to take testimony, of which the first forty days belong to the contestant, the second forty days to the contestee in reply, and the remaining ten days to the contestant in rebuttal.

Now, consider what chance a contestant would have of getting his case decided before the two Houses proceeded to the count of the electoral votes. He learns on the 25th of November that the certificate has been issued to his competitor. He has till the 25th of December to serve the notice of contest. Suppose by great diligence he is able to serve it on the 15th of the month. Now the contestee has till the 15th day of January to serve his answer. He is not likely to waive this right. He has no motive to do so, and his party may have, as I will show, a strong motive to forbid him to waive it. The time for taking testimony would therefore expire on the 15th of April.

Now, even if the beginning of the Presidential term were postponed till the 30th of April and the beginning of the electoral count were postponed to a later date than the second Wednesday of February, even if the Committee on Elections were promptly to act upon the case and report it to the House and the House were with equal promptness to consider and decide it, what probability is there that it could be decided in time to allow the contestant, if successful, to take part in the counting of the electoral votes? It would be practically impossible. The result would be that the electoral votes would be counted by those who have received certificates of election whether in fact duly elected or not.

What difference would that make, it may be asked. I answer that if the Presidential election has gone with a great majority one way or the other it would make no difference whatever. But if the Presidential election is close or doubtful, and especially if there is a likelihood that the election of the President would devolve upon the House, the effect upon the confidence of the public in the integrity of the election returns would be serious. When the Presidential election is close the fact is known all over the country within twenty-four hours after the polls are closed. It is known long before any State canvassing board can issue certificates of election to members of the House. It is known even before the local canvassing boards in the several districts can canvass the votes. Long before the certificates are issued to members of the House by the State canvassing boards it may be known that the success of one party or the other in securing the certificates of election in a few Congressional districts will have an important bearing on the counting of the electoral votes.

The State canvassing boards are in most of the States political in character. They will be strongly tempted to give certificates to members of their own party, even though they may be sure that their action is likely to be reversed after the electoral count has been made. They know that it can not be reversed before that time. The Presidency with all its patronage may hang upon the result of their decision. The temptations would be almost irresistible. A man will do that for his party which he would not do for himself. The temptation will be re-enforced by the most plausible excuses. He may be told that the opposing party in other districts is straining the law and overriding facts to its own advantage. There are many who at such times are ready to insist on fighting the devil with fire. He will be told that even if he acts with scrupulous impartiality he will not get the credit of so doing. The result will be general suspicion throughout the country.

Charges of gross fraud will find ready credence. Contests would be made in almost every close Congressional district throughout the country. The country would stand face to face with a serious danger. It may be said that the contingency to which I allude is a remote one. I admit it. It is to guard against just such remote contingencies that we passed a bill in the last Congress. We can not afford to increase in the slightest degree the dangers which are involved in it when it does occur.

It may be said that canvassing boards are subject to the same temptations now, and that the danger would be only slightly greater if the electoral count were intrusted to a newly-elected House. It would be vastly greater. A few weeks ago this House decided a contested-election case from the State of Indiana. If the Democratic majority of this House had chosen to seat the contestant in that case, it would have destroyed the preponderance of the Republican party in the election of the President by the House if it devolved upon the House after the next election. Republican papers were free to charge that the Democratic majority would act upon this motive.

Having this in mind, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], speaking for the contestee, declared that although he would not believe that any member of the majority would be influenced by such consideration, yet if there were any such he begged him to remember that although the Democratic party might thus gain an advantage in a contingency as yet remote, yet, if in order to gain that remote and problematical advantage, the Democratic party offended the sense of justice in the American people it would lose more than it would gain. The November election would intervene. Any violation of justice and fair dealing by any political party would be punished at the polls. His argument was a logical one.

But, Mr. Speaker, what force would the argument have had if at the time the November election did not intervene? What force would it have had had the eloquent gentleman from New York been addressing a House which in a few weeks would proceed to count the electoral votes in a Presidential contest which had already occurred? It would have had no force at all. It is not wise to subject any political party whatever to the temptation which the adoption of this constitutional amendment would create.

I hope the resolution to suspend the rules will not be adopted. I hope the Constitution will never be amended merely to avoid an inconvenience. I hope the remedy for existing evils by a change of the Constitution will not be resorted to till the remedy by act of Congress has been tried and has failed.

I hope this House will never agree to add in the slightest degree to the danger of a disputed Presidential election.

Mr. CRAIN. I shall endeavor in the brief time left me to answer the objection raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] before proceeding to discuss the questions raised by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. The objection which the gentleman from Illinois presents, that if this amendment should be adopted there would be danger of fraud in the giving of certificates of election to members of Congress, because the members receiving those certificates would participate in the count of the electoral vote, is not, in my judgment, a sound objection.

Up to the time Congress passed the general act in 1872 declaring that the election of members of the House of Representatives should take place all over the country on the same day, every State in the Union elected its Representatives whenever it deemed proper to do so. As a consequence during some sessions of Congress, I mean extra sessions, there were States unrepresented because under the existing State election laws no election was held in time to secure any representation of said States in the House of Representatives.

I hold in my hand a statement prepared by the Librarian of Congress, which discloses the fact that Delaware under these circumstances was unrepresented in the first session of the Thirteenth Congress, in 1818. Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Michigan, Mississippi, and Missouri were unrepresented in the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, in 1837. Alabama, Illinois, and Mississippi were unrepresented in the first session of the Twenty-seventh Congress, in 1841. At the first session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, in 1861, there was no representation from California or Oregon. At the first session of the Fortieth Congress, in 1867, there was no representation from California, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Oregon, Kentucky, Nebraska, or Rhode Island. At the extra session of the Fortieth Congress, in 1867, July 3, there was no representation from California, Connecticut, or Rhode Island. Nor was there any representation at the first session of the Forty-first Congress, in 1869, from Connecticut and New Hampshire. At the called session, in 1861, there was no representation from the State of Kentucky. There was a vacancy between the 4th of March and the first Monday of December, because the election day took place in August.

If, therefore, the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] is a good one, it would apply to the past as much as it would to the future. It has not applied in the past, and the danger which the gentleman fears is simply an imaginary one.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes; if there be unanimous consent that it will no be taken out of my time.

Mr. BLAND. I hope it will not be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. CRAIN. Very well.

Mr. BLAND. It is a serious objection, in my mind, to the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. CRAIN. If the gentleman has unanimous consent to ask the question, not to come out of my time, I do not object.

Mr. BLAND. The objection I wish the gentleman to answer is this: He assumes Congress, by the consent of the State Legislatures, can extend the term of the President for one month. If they can extend it for one month, why not for one year or for two years? If they have that power where is the limitation to it? Thus, if we confer the power, they would have the right to elect a President.

Mr. CRAIN. I answer that proposition—yes.

Mr. BLAND. Then you can not deny there is no limit to the power when it is once assumed to exist?

Mr. CRAIN. I say, through a constitutional amendment, the Congress of the United States, with the ratification of the necessary number of States, can make a President of the United States for life if they choose to do so, or establish a King in this country.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes; if by unanimous consent it does not come out of my time.

Mr. MORGAN. Have the people conferred any such power upon Congress?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir; the Constitution itself provides for the manner of amendment of that instrument. It provides if two-thirds of both Houses of Congress shall adopt an amendment to the Constitution, and that amendment shall be ratified by three-fourths of the States of the Union, then it shall be incorporated into and become a part of the organic law of the land, and Congress, acting in its representative capacity on any proposition affecting the Government, by the ratification of three-fourths of the States, can make it a part of the organic law of the land. That is my answer to the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes; if I get consent that it will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It will not be taken out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. CRAIN. What is it?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Suppose this is ratified by the requisite number of States by the 1st day of December in 1889, would not a member elected in November next go out of office on the 30th of December, 1889?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, 1890.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No, 1889.

Mr. CRAIN. In answering that I answer the objection raised by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]—that is, by the proposed amendment we extend the term of President Cleveland. If this were a political amendment I would say to the gentleman that the people intend to do that whether we pass this amendment or not. [Laughter and applause.] But it is not a political question, and I do not propose to discuss it from a political standpoint.

Mr. BURROWS. Allow me a moment.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. CRAIN. I will say in answer to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] that this amendment does extend the term of the President of the United States who is now the Chief Executive, but it does not apply to any Executive in the future; and I deny emphatically the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan if this amendment is ratified it affects this Congress, because it would be impossible in the nature of things to ratify the amendment so as to make it affect the Fiftieth Congress, as the official list supplied by the Librarian of Congress shows that a sufficient number of Legislatures will not meet between now and the first Monday of December next, unless the governors of the States should call them into extra session for that purpose, which is not likely to occur.

Mr. BURROWS. But I only assumed, if the amendment was adopted, that would be the effect; and I wish to say that I made not the slighest allusion to President Cleveland or any other President.

Mr. CRAIN. Of course, if the gentleman acts upon assumption that alters the case, and I have not a word to say.

Mr. BURROWS. But it illustrates a principle, and to that I was directing the attention of the House.

Mr. CRAIN. I repeat, it is impossible to ratify the amendment between now and the election day, or even the 31st of December, to make the amendment effective so as to affect the term of the Fiftieth Congress; and that is a bugbear in the imagination of gentlemen who have not prh aps fully considered the question as now presented.

Mr OATES. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the next Congress, when it is elected, would be elected in view of this change in the Constitution, and with a knowledge of the fact?

Mr. CRAIN. Certainly; and when men went into the canvass for election to the next Congress they would go with this fact staring them in the face, with the understanding that this constitutional amendment would deprive the members of that Congress of about two months' time. But it can not, I repeat, in the very nature of things, happen that a sufficient number of the State Legislatures will meet in time to ratify the amendment so as to affect the present Congress, unless, as I have already said, the very improbable event should happen that the governors of the States would call the Legislatures of the States in extra session for that purpose. A sufficient number, however, will meet in time to ratify the amendment which relates to the extension of the time of the present incumbent of the executive chair, and which also fixes the beginning and the termination of the term of all his successors and of the Vice-Presidents.

The gentleman on the other side, from the State of Minnesota, I believe, said that this idea of Representatives coming fresh from the people is all nonsense. I desire to suggest to the gentleman that if he means that some of us come rather "fresh" from the people I would agree with him [laughter]; but what I mean is that the people, to use an English phrase, should be "in touch" with their Representatives, and instead of a man being elected thirteen months before he comes here and takes his seat, he should be here within sixty days after his election and legislate upon the questions which were vital issues before the people when he was elected and on which his election was based.

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAIN. If it does not come out of my time I will. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. PETERS. I would like to ask the gentleman if there has ever been a Congress elected that has not been composed of two-thirds of the members of the preceding Congress?

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERS. Which?

Mr. CRAIN. The first Congress of the United States. [Laughter.]

I think that this amendment should be adopted for another reason, which has not been suggested in this debate, and it is this: that under existing conditions the President of the United States is elected thirteen months before he submits his message to Congress, making such suggestions as he deems proper that Congress should act upon. If you adopt this amendment he will have a Congress organized and in session on the 30th day of April, ready to receive the message which he has to give to the country. Again, instead of the House being for nine months of the year after the election of a new Congress, as at present, without a presiding officer, within ten days, to say the least, after the expiration of the term of his predecessor a new Speaker would be chosen and would be presiding over the deliberations of the House.

This is the only country in the civilized world in which legislators are elected to settle issues that are dead when they come to act upon them thirteen months after their election. Representatives should be in their seats at work within a reasonable time after their election, not thirteen months afterwards, and they should not be forced to leave their posts of duty at the Capitol to go into their districts and contend for renomination in the midst of a busy session and before their record is made up. I hope the amendment will pass.

Mr. McCOMAS. I rise to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCOMAS. This proposition is really two propositions. It proposes to lengthen the term of the President of the United States in one, and proposes at the same time to change the time of the assembling of Congress in the other. I happen to favor one of these propositions, and am opposed to the other. Now, until two-thirds have voted in favor of it I understand the rules are not suspended, and of course it requires two-thirds to pass an amendment to the Constitution through the House. My question, therefore, is this: If it should happen that a member desires to vote for one of these propositions and against the other, is it not proper that the question, if demanded, should be divided? In other words, is it not a divisible question? I find that Rule XXVIII three times uses the words "a proposition," any proposition, or some proposition, as I understand it; and my inquiry is, whether we can not have a separate vote on the two propositions embodied in this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. This is a motion to suspend that rule and all others as well; and every vote upon the proposition pending, which is to suspend the rules and pass the resolution, necessarily involves a proposition to suspend all rules ordinarily governing the House, and bring the House to a vote directly upon the proposition presented, which may embrace one or many items.

Mr. McCOMAS. But until the rules are suspended does not the custom of dividing a proposition prevail?

The SPEAKER. It does not. Other rules provide for debate, provide for amendment, provide for motions to lay on the table, etc.; but none of these are applicable to a motion to suspend the rules and pass a measure. The question now is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOOKER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I find that the joint resolution proposes two additional articles to the Constitution of the United States, and it seems to me, in view of that fact, that the point of order made by the gentleman from Maryland on my right must be correctly made; for when we come to vote on these propositions we must surely call for a division of the question and vote upon the first article proposed to the Constitution and separately upon the second.

The SPEAKER. No. The Chair thinks that if the rule to which the gentleman refers, of dividing this question, applied to this case, then all of the other rules would apply as well, and it would be subject to amendment, subject to motions to lie on the table, subject to motions to postpone, or a motion to commit, as well as all other parliamentary motions which prevail in the ordinary course of legislation. But the motion to suspend the rules and pass the proposition is an entire question in itself.

Mr. HOOKER. My inquiry is addressed to the fact, when we come to vote on the articles as amendments to the Constitution, whether or not the question is not properly divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The single proposition is the pending motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution, which embodies both of the features to which the gentleman alludes.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 80, nays 154, not voting 90; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 1611) for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mo.;

An act (H. R. 6437) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 5373) to change the location of a certain alley in the city of Washington; and

An act (H. R. 1528) to reward the Esquimaux natives of the Asiatic coast of the Arctic Ocean for acts of humanity to shipwrecked seamen.

ASSIGNMENT OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Rules has had under consideration various resolutions making special orders for the consideration of bills, and in lieu of all the propositions submitted to it begs leave to report the accompanying resolution with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee found that the assignment of more than thirty days was asked for, and as it was manifestly impossible to interrupt the regular business for so great a length of time the committee has made as just an apportionment among the several committees as it was possible to agree upon, and now submits its action for the consideration of the House.

Resolved, That Tuesday and Wednesday, April 3 and 4, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of Senate bill 139, to provide for refunding the direct tax levied in 1861, and after the consideration of said bill is completed the remainder of said time is set apart for the consideration of any other bill or bills designated by the Committee on the Judiciary.

That Thursday and Saturday, April 5 and 7, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Commerce in such order as said committee may designate.

That on Tuesday, April 3, and Thursday, April 5, the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs in such order as may be designated by said committee.

That Tuesday, April 10, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, in such order as said committee may designate.

That on Monday, April 9, the House shall take a recess at 5 p. m. until 8 p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to debate upon House bill No. 8184, to amend the Thurman act.

That Wednesday, April 11, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Territories, in such order as said committee may designate.

That Thursday, April 12, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of House bill No. 6897, reported from the Committee on Public Lands; and if the consideration of said bill shall be completed the remainder of said day be set apart for the consideration of any other bill or bills reported from said committee, in such order as it may designate.

That on Tuesday, the 10th of April, and Thursday, the 12th of April, the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Territories, in such order as said committee may designate.

That on Wednesday, April 11, the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., the evening session to be devoted exclusively to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in such order as said committee may designate.

That Thursday, May 10, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Agriculture, in such order as may be designated by said committee.

That Tuesday, May 15 and June 19 and 26, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in such order as said committee may designate.

That none of the foregoing assignments of days shall interfere with the consideration of revenue or general appropriation bills, but the order assigning a day to the Committee on Agriculture shall be a continuing one until two days have been occupied in the consideration of bills reported by it, and on any of the days hereinbefore designated, immediately after the reading of the Journal, a motion shall be in order that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue or general appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know that I can add anything to the reading of the report which will further enlighten the House. I am advised that other gentlemen desire to qualify the report to some degree, and I am ready now to listen, along with the rest of the members of the House, to any proposition which may be made on the part of any member of the Judiciary Committee to strike out that part of the report which indicates the bill which shall be considered on to-morrow and the next day. I am ready also to yield for an amendment to strike out the like provision from the paragraph designating a day for the Committee on Public Lands, so as to leave it entirely with that committee to determine what business shall be called up on that day and the order of its introduction.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a motion to strike out of the paragragh fixing the time for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the Judiciary that portion of it which designates for consideration the Senate bill known as the bill for the refunding of the direct tax, so that the resolution may simply provide that the time mentioned is allotted to the Committee on the Judiciary for the consideration of bills reported from it in such order as the committee may designate. And now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words in support of this motion. It is but fair for me to state a fact which, if not generally known, I wish all gentlemen on this floor to know and understand, that I am very much—I may say unalterably—opposed to that bill; but my motion is predicated not upon any opposition to the bill, but upon the idea that it is not quite fair or respectful to the Committee on the Judiciary to tie it down to the consideration of one particular measure, and to say that no other business from that committee can be considered until that measure is disposed of, especially when it is well known that there is a division in the committee touching that particular bill.

I presume, however, that this proposition has its origin in the fact that when the Judiciary Committee a short time ago had two days assigned for the consideration of its measures, this particular bill was not brought forward. I will state why it was not. The resolution fixing those two days was offered by myself. The unanimous consent of the House was required to permit its consideration, and some members on this floor, gentlemen who are now present, called on me to ask whether that bill would be brought up for consideration during the two days if they should be assigned to the committee. I had to give those gentlemen an assurance, as I felt I had a right to do on behalf of the committee, that that bill would not be brought forward if the objection which would otherwise be made should be withheld and we should be allowed to have those two days. Now, why should this extraordinary proposition be put to the House when it is well known that a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary are in favor of this bill? It has been favorably reported and is on the Calendar, and the views of the minority are signed by only three members of the committee. I have no doubt that the same majority which reported the bill here will determine, if they are allowed to, the order in which and the time at which it shall be brought forward for consideration.

There are other very important measures, one of which has been already partly considered—I mean the bill reorganizing the district and circuit courts—and I submit it is utterly unfair to tie that committee down to this proposition. Let the committee decide, and if they say that this bill should be considered first I will submit to it; I may be compelled to submit to it anyway. But I would greatly prefer, Mr. Speaker, that this matter should be settled in the usual method. It is usual to allow a committee to determine what particular measures they will bring forward and in what order. And certainly the gentlemen on the Judiciary Committee who voted to report this bill favorably have the power to say in what order and at what time it shall be brought forward for consideration. I hope this amendment will be adopted; for its effect will be simply to leave it to the Judiciary Committee to determine the order in which the business of that committee shall be presented for consideration, and whether this particular bill shall be the first measure brought forward.

Mr. BAYNE. Is not the tax-refunding bill now in possession of the House?

Mr. OATES. Certainly; and so is every other bill that the committee could call up.

Mr. BAYNE. The bill being in the possession of the House, is it not perfectly competent for the House to decide whether it will take it up on the days mentioned or not?

Mr. OATES. It is perfectly competent for the House to determine that matter; but why should this particular bill be singled out for first consideration, in preference to every other measure?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Because there is such a strong sentiment in favor of it.

Mr. OATES. Does the gentleman distrust the majority of the Judiciary Committee that reported the bill? Will they not have the power, even if this amendment be adopted, to bring forward that measure?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. We gave the committee two days and this measure was not considered.

Mr. OATES. I have explained, so that the gentleman ought to understand, the reasons it was not considered; and no one knows better than the gentleman that I have correctly stated those reasons.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me a moment. I heard the request made in open House, and, as I understood, without qualification, for time for the consideration of business of the Judiciary Committee, and not being aware of any secret understanding between the gentleman from Alabama and other gentlemen I did not object. If I had known that there was in his mind a mental reservation which had been manifested to some gentlemen, but which did not go upon the Journal or the records of the House, I would have objected.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I wish to say that gentlemen did rise here and object. I appeal to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], who sits before me, and who was one of those who made the inquiry, and to my colleague [Mr. HERBERT], who was another. To these gentlemen I gave the assurance—not in secret, but openly—that this bill would not be brought forward. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] says now that my statement is correct, that it was understood this bill would not be brought forward.

I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR].

Mr. RANDALL. How much time does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] want?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Five or possibly ten minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to strike out so much of the resolution as requires that on the days assigned to business of the Judiciary Committee the bill to refund the direct tax shall be first considered.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the bill just mentioned by you is one of great importance, and ought to be considered early if it is to be considered at all.

The friends of the bill have been trying to get the ear of the House upon propositions fixing time for the consideration of the bill, and they have been objected to. Finally we were obliged to have our proposition fixing a time for the consideration of the bill referred to the Committee on Rules. As the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] says, a majority of the Judiciary Committee are in favor of this bill, as shown by their report as well as by the statement of the gentleman. Three members of the committee have filed a minority report. Our resolution having been referred to the Committee on Rules, the bill being before the House and in its possession, this resolution has been reported. I venture to say (and here there is a matter of taste, and nothing else, between the gentleman from Alabama and myself) that the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, who favor this bill, have no objection to this report of the Committee on Rules, but on the other hand warmly sustain it and wish it to be sustained by the House.

It may be true that the Judiciary Committee would again direct the consideration of the bill if a meeting of the committee should be held and a quorum attend. But to-morrow is the day fixed by the Committee on Rules in this resolution for the consideration of our business. The House has a right, it is the business of the House, to fix a time for the consideration of this bill, and a committee of the House has proposed to-morrow. Now, speaking on behalf of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, we insist that this report should be sustained by the House. I recognize this amendment as a part of the opposition to the bill, and for that reason I wish the report of the Committee on Rules to be sustained.

The bill is one involving the payment of about $16,000,000. It is a matter with which members of this House are thoroughly conversant. They know how this claim originated; they know its present standing; they know there ought to be some disposition of the question, which has appeared before us time and again. I would dislike exceedingly to have any amendment made to this resolution which would throw any uncertainty about the time when consideration is to be given to the bill. I hope the time as proposed by the Committee on Rules may be fixed, so that there may be abundant opportunity to consider the measure fairly and well.

I yield the residue of my ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL], a member of the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] has five minutes.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I earnestly desire the attention of the House because this question affects every member present. Here is a proposition reported to fix to-morrow and the next day for the consideration of business of the Judiciary Committee, giving priority to the bill refunding the direct tax. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out that part of the resolution giving this bill priority, so as to leave the subject to the discretion of the Judiciary Committee. He asks why this bill should have precedence over other business of the committee. I will tell him why. As he has already stated, the House some days ago gave to our committee two days for the consideration of its bills. This bill was one of the first on the Calendar, and because there was some contention about its passage, some strong opposition to it in the committee, we passed it over for the time being, and I introduced a resolution before those days were reached, asking the House to fix two days in the future, so we might omit this bill from the assignment. That is the reason why it is given priority in the resolution now before the House.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the members of this House, if you are in favor of passing the bill at this session you will oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] and support the report of the Committee on Rules. If you are opposed to the bill then you ought to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] has stated, to-morrow is the first day of the assignment. Our committee has another meeting, it is true, to-morrow in the forenoon, at which we might settle this question. We might agree to take up this bill, but the probability is we will not settle it, and we will come here without any bill agreed upon for consideration. You all know how easy it would be for a committee meeting to-morrow to consume the entire hour for the consideration of the bill, or question before it, and when the hour of 12 o'clock is reached the committee would be dissolved, as we have no right to remain in session for a longer time. The time would be frittered away and we would come on the floor of the House without this question being settled.

Here is a proposition reported by the Committee on Rules which settles it and makes a certainty of the consideration of this bill to-morrow. The only way is to reject the amendment if we are in favor of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You are in favor, then, of making this a test vote as to whether members are in favor of or hostile to this bill.

Mr. CASWELL. Yes, it necessarily involves that very question.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield now for five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the only objection which the gentleman from Wisconsin has urged on this occasion is that when the Committee on the Judiciary meets to-morrow for the purpose of determining the order of its business its time will be consumed by filibustering down the business for consideration. Now what warrant has my friend from Wisconsin to make any such charge as that against the minority of the committee which filed the minority report in this case? I think I may state without being called to order, there never has been any filibustering in that committee on that bill and never a particle of delay, with the exception of what was necessary for action on one or two amendments which we desired to offer.

There is no sort of desire—certainly none on my part—of any member of that committee to interfere with it in any manner like that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why is it this measure has taken precedence over all the other business referred to that committee? Here we are in the midst of the consideration of a measure affecting the whole judicial system of our Government, partly debated, partly considered, and yet, under this resolution, that measure, of far more importance than this can be, is to be thrust aside and give way to this one.

There is the Utah amendment, looking to the crushing out of polygamy throughout the United States, and yet the amendment takes from the Judiciary Committee the power to say whether that shall have precedence or this bill shall have precedence.

I do not know what course shall be pursued, but I can say to these gentlemen, they will not have the power, even if they pass this resolution against our objection, to thrust it down our throats when it comes here. There is always a way to meet these measures and to meet them fairly and justly. If you propose to have this measure considered fairly and justly, you will do it with some little show of courtesy toward gentlemen who are opposed to it.

Mr. CASWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. CASWELL. Let me ask the gentleman whether there is an organization already to filibuster against this bill when it comes up?

Mr. ROGERS. I know of no such organization.

Mr. CASWELL. Do you know that such is the intention?

Mr. ROGERS. That is a matter which belongs to individual members.

Mr. CASWELL. Very well.

Mr. ROGERS. If the intention exists it will exist as well without the resolution as with it.

Mr. CASWELL. I hope the gentleman will not charge the debate on this bill as a reason for what is intended to be done by them.

Mr. ROGERS. My friend from Ohio, I repeat, will not put a gag in the mouth of our committee by passing this resolution. If there is such purpose on the part of the committee to defeat it it will not go through in three or five days if necessary to do it. I do not know what course will be pursued. I have not determined in my own mind what course I will pursue. But I tell you now when you come to thrust measures through and to bind the Judiciary Committee you will find that you are turning the hair the wrong way, instead of smoothing it down.

Mr. BAYNE. Does the gentleman mean to say he will set the example of filibustering?

Mr. ROGERS. I am not afraid to do what I consider to be right, here or anywhere else. I am opposed to this measure, and I am opposed to it because I consider it is absolutely revolutionary and the most pernicious doctrine which has ever found lodgment in the human brain.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] so much time as he may desire, as a member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I think by this time the House must be quite well satisfied that it is very greatly pressed with business, and that the question of vital importance before it is what business shall be transacted. In order to give guidance to this, all these resolutions have been referred to the Committee on Rules, as has grown to be the custom of late years in the House.

That committee, composed of members of the Committee on Appropriations and on Ways and Means, which committees have the right of way under the rules of the House, is perhaps in a condition of as much disinterestedness as any committee of the House can be; and I think that their report, presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to-day, is a fair indication of their willingness to look over the whole field and take all the matters before the House fairly into consideration, for the only criticism that has thus far been invoked against the report has been on the part of some members of the Judiciary Committee. Now, I can assure those gentlemen that there is not the slightest disposition to do anything which shall in any way interfere with the dignity and standing of that committee on the floor. In fact, no action on our part, or on the part of the House, could do that. The reason why a particular bill was selected in that case was because of paramount considerations. The Committee on the Judiciary have already had two days at their disposal. They asked for two more. The Committee on Rules, believing that the House had a sincere desire to reach and pass the bill named in the resolution, have felt that it was their duty to yield to that wish.

For my part I am of opinion that in the great majority of cases the House, acting through its committees primarily, and subsequently through itself, should fix upon the measures to be considered rather than leave them to the committees. But there are a great number of minor measures desirable to pass, but which the country can get along without, which fact has given rise to the habit, which seems to be growing upon the House, of giving days to committees instead of days to measures; and I wish here and now to enter my protest against that as a system; for I believe that in time it will grow to be a trouble and a clog to the House, leaving it more under the control of its committees than it ought to be, or than it is now; and I think that the evil of committee control exclusively in these matters has become very apparent to the House in this last session of Congress.

But I wish to call the attention of the House to an important matter in this connection. I do not believe that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] is permitting himself consciously to get into that state of mind in regard to this bill which will justify actions on his part which are usually denominated filibustering; but I wish to assure him, from my knowledge of the workings of the human mind, that there is great danger of his doing so if he allows this to become a matter of feeling instead of judgment. But it will be noticed that the opposition here to this report of the Committee on Rules does not come from the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Nor from the chairman.

Mr. REED. The committee in itself does not feel aggrieved at anything which has been done. It is only gentlemen who are opposed to the bill in question who seem to feel that impulse. They have a perfect right to be opposed to it, but if the House is in favor of it, the House has a perfect right to facilitate its passage by all proper parliamentary means; and surely the gentleman from Arkansas would be the last man to oppose himself to the wishes of the House, manifested under proper forms and in a proper way.

The House being desirous of passing this bill, if I am right in supposing so, and the vote will disclose that fact—the House being desirous of passing this bill, does not wish the intervention of anybody to decide that matter for them. They are competent to decide and are willing to decide it, and they purpose to offer the matter in such fashion that there will be an incentive on all hands to bring the bill to immediate consideration. The desire for immediate consideration will exist on the part of the majority, because they desire to pass the bill; and it will exist on the part of the minority because, although they may be opposed to this bill, they are earnestly in favor of other matters of important legislation which can be attended to when this is disposed of. Therefore, I trust we shall have a harmonious House to-morrow for the passage of this bill, and that no unnecessary time will be consumed on it, but that a majority of the Representatives on this floor, representing the majority of the people, will do as they ought to do, reach the control of this legislation in the shortest time.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I favor the amendment of my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES]. It seems to me that so far as the action of this committee relates to the conclusion that the Judiciary Committee may not determine the order in which its bills shall be taken up, but prescribes that before they will consider anything else they shall take up and consider a given bill, is entirely unprecedented.

The practice of the House, in the reference of resolutions assigning days for the consideration of bills reported by committees, was never intended to do more than to settle this condition of things; that without any one supervising control, one committee after another would come in with resolutions assigning days, and the House would not keep the various orders in mind or be in a condition to distribute the time to best advantage by reason of this lack of information.

The result was that the House rarely knew, or never knew, when a given proposition was up, what had been done with reference to other committees, and could not maintain proper regulation of its business. For that reason alone it has been the practice to refer to the Committee on Rules the question of assignment of days to committees. Beyond this it has never gone till now.

I take it it was never the purpose of the House to give to the Committee on Rules the power to determine what measures should be taken up. It would be a most unreasonable thing that it should have that power. A committee is the best judge of what measures should be taken up of those which have been committed to it. The rules of the House determine what subjects they shall consider, and leave to them the question of whether they shall be reported at all, and if they are reported the time for their consideration.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have but five minutes. If the gentleman will secure me an extension of time I will yield to him.

Mr. CANNON. I merely wish to state that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] and referred to the Committee on Rules specially provided for two days and asked for two days to consider this particular Senate bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. But the report goes further. It not only gives time for the consideration of that bill, but it prescribes that this House shall not consider any other bill from the Judiciary Committee until that one has been considered.

Mr. OATES. That resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] as a member of the House and not as representing the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman from Georgia will allow me, I will say that I understand there was another resolution offered by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary asking for the consideration of this measure.

Mr. BLOUNT. I care not whether that resolution was offered or not. The fact stands out that the Committee on Rules have determined this particular bill shall be considered in preference to others. I submit it never was designed that such power should be conferred upon them.

Mr. CASWELL. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have but five minutes, and unless my time is extended I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CASWELL. The gentleman is mistaken in his statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. I decline to be corrected in this running debate when my time is limited.

That is the report of the Committee on Rules, that the Committee on the Judiciary may not elect as to this particular bill, but when that is disposed of they may as to every bill from that committee; but this shall be considered by the edict of the Committee on Rules. I say such procedure is violative of the good sense of this House and is unfair to the several committees of this House.

The gentleman from Ohio says that the majority of the Judiciary Committee are in favor of this and therefore it ought to be done. They like it, it is true, because they happen to want this very power exercised to further their own ends; not from any higher reason than that. I protest for one against the abuse, as I regard it, of the Committee on Rules forcing on this House a measure which is not impelled by any public exigency and which is expected to take from the Treasury $17,500,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON.]

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish simply to state that I had knowledge of the fact that that resolution had been introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] and referred to the Committee on Rules for the purpose of obtaining a day or two days for the consideration of this bill. On last Monday I introduced an additional resolution, asking for another day for the consideration of the business of that committee generally. This, I think, is all that it is necessary to state in relation to the introduction of the resolution. I introduced the resolution I offered in response to suggestions of the committee.

Mr. CASWELL. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CASWELL. I drew this resolution providing expressly for two days to be assigned for the consideration of this bill. The Committee on Rules simply say this, that after the disposition of the bill referred to in the resolution and for which time was asked, if there be any time remaining, it may be used in considering other bills. That is all the committee do in reference to this.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Rules, in presenting this matter to the consideration of the House, are, I believe, absolutely without feeling. They acted upon one or two resolutions duly referred to that committee, as they were in duty bound, and they have remitted this question to this House practically in this form. If the House desires that this bill shall be considered, then the responsibility in that connection shall be taken by the House. If, on the other hand, a majority of this House do not want to consider that bill and prefer to consider other matters from the Judiciary Committee, then the two days remain and the matter is disposed of.

Now, I think we fully understand this question, and I demand the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to withhold his demand for the previous question and allow me a moment.

Mr. RANDALL. In that connection?

Mr. COX. Yes; in that connection.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I notice in the report of the committee that they have planned the business of the House in advance for nearly a month.

Mr. RANDALL. For two weeks.

Mr. COX. And I notice that in their resolution they provide always that after the reading of the Journal these various classes of business may come up for action. That cuts off not only the morning hour for reports of committees, which I suppose might be handed in at the Clerk's desk, or be otherwise made by unanimous consent, but it cuts off also the morning hour for the consideration of bills. That would operate inconveniently for one-half of the committees that have not had a chance to call up bills for consideration.

And I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and to the House, that there are other committees that have business which requires attention, one that I have an interest in and that I have been waiting for; but committees in the last part of the list have no show at all in this Congress if this system is to be kept up.

No doubt the committee have considered this matter with entire impartiality, and I will favor any proposition they may present for the dispatch of our business. Days must, of course, be set down either for special bills or for special committees, but I think this resolution which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has reported from the Committee on Rules might well be amended, so as to strike out the provision that these days shall be set apart for the business of these several committees "immediately after the reading of the Journal," and allow us the morning hour for the consideration of bills. That morning hour has been of great utility. It has been one of the best instruments for expediting the business of the House. I have been delighted and surprised to see how business has been floated through in that hour; but now, from the Committee on Rules—a committee appointed for the guardianship of the rules of this House—we have a report proposing to set aside the most valuable rule in the House for the purpose of giving special advantages to special bills and special committees.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit me to move the amendment I have suggested?

Mr. RANDALL. Not now.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

A MEMBER. What is the amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. The effect of the amendment is simply to give to the Judiciary Committee control of the business which shall be called up on these two days.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposes to strike out so much of the resolution as provides that the bill in relation to the refund of the direct tax shall be first considered.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I call for the reading of the words proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "be set apart for the consideration of Senate bill 139, to provide for refunding the direct tax levied in 1861."

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. OATES, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

A division was called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 98.

Mr. OATES. No quorum.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and Mr. DIBBLE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 70, nays 161, not voting 93; as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. PAYSON asked unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. OATES objected.

Before the result of the vote was announced several members, present during the roll-call, whose votes had not been recorded, asked to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the practice of the House in reference to this matter. When a gentleman rises and states that he was in the Hall during the roll-call and failed to hear his name called, he is entitled to vote.

Mr. BURROWS. Suppose a member is present and hears his name called, but does not vote?

The SPEAKER. In such a case, under the practice of the House, the member has no right to vote. If, when he hears his name, he withholds his vote purposely, the Chair thinks the member can not have his vote recorded after the conclusion of the second roll-call. Such at least has been the practice of the House. Gentleman, in asking after the conclusion of the roll-call that their names be recorded, must state that they were in the Hall but failed to hear their names called.

The following additional pairs were announced on all political questions for the rest of the day:

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, with Mr. KERR.

Mr. HOGG with Mr. FUNSTON.

Mr. LAWLER with Mr. PHELPS.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Pending the calling of the roll, Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled a bill (H. R. 3470) to authorize the construction of bridges over the rivers St. Mary's, Satilla, Little Satilla, and Crooked, in the States of Georgia and Florida; when the Speaker signed the same.

AFFAIRS IN SAMOA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with its inclosures, in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th ultimo, in relation to affairs in Samoa.

ASSIGNMENT OF BUSINESS.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. RANDALL from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. OATES. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that motion will not prevail.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to; there being—ayes 16, noes 104.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me to have an amendment read?

Mr. RANDALL. Not now.

Mr. COX. When?

Mr. RANDALL. I can not fix a time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the portion of the pending resolution which relates to the consideration of business from the Committee on Public Lands be read.

Mr. OATES. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. RANDALL. I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana had possession of the floor and can not be taken off of it without his consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the resolution relative to the business of the Committee on Public Lands.

The Clerk read as follows:

That Thursday, April 12, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of House bill 6897, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, and if the consideration of said bill shall be completed the remainder of said day be set apart for the consideration of any other bill or bills reported from said committee in such order as it may designate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out all of that resolution in relation to bill 6897, and I wish to state a few facts for the information of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is the resolution open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yielded the floor to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. RANDALL. Under instructions of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to state to the House that a month ago the Committee on the Public Lands reported to the House a bill for which I have sought every opportunity of a hearing, but which so far has had but an hour and a half some days ago. That is a bill for the purpose of securing the remaining public lands of the United States for the benefit of actual settlers.

That committee also prepared bills involving the forfeiture of land grants to railroad corporations to the extent of some thirty millions of acres. These bills are of great public moment as well as the one I have mentioned as the bill to secure the remaining public lands to actual settlers, now pending as unfinished business before the House. But the bill indicated in the amendment which I have had read at the Clerk's desk, that is, bill 6897, is simply a bill to adjust the accounts of swamp lands of the several States, the proposition being to pay to the several States at the rate of $1.25 an acre for lands which the United States disposed of since the grant was made in 1850.

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that bill is of no great public moment compared with the bill to forfeit land grants and to secure the remainder of the public lands for the benefit of actual settlers. Yet the Committee on Rules reports in favor of only a single day and gives this comparatively private bill priority.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to know of the gentleman from Indiana whether it is not a fact that the bills he has enumerated, other than the swamp-land bills, are not privileged bills——

Mr. HOLMAN. I can not yield further.

Mr. DUNN. And therefore it is necessary to give those bills a place, but it is not necessary——

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not yield any further. I am glad the gentleman has called attention to that fact. The House will see that all of the time for weeks to come is farmed out and bills of the highest public importance are almost indefinitely postponed.

Mr. DUNN. Not if they are privileged.

Mr. HOLMAN. Privilege amounts to nothing. When the time monopolized by other committees——

Mr. DUNN. That one bill would pass in one day.

Mr. HOLMAN. The important bills I have indicated are to be postponed and the day mentioned in the resolution is to be taken up in the consideration of bill 6897, which is of a private nature, compared with those other bills. It may involve a large amount of money, but it relates largely to private interests.

Mr. DUNN. Not a private interest involved in it, but all public.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there is not, but the bills I have referred to are bills of the highest public moment—bills providing for the forfeiture of railroad land grants to the extent of some 30,000,000 of acres and securing the remaining public lands for the benefit of actual settlers. I ask to strike out the bill indicated and to substitute therefor a provision allowing the Committee on Public Lands to determine what bills shall be brought before the House.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman recognize any bills the committee may regard as privileged? I ask the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will answer it. There is no privilege about it, for the time is farmed out. The privilege under the rule is of no value if the time is covered by special orders.

Mr. PARKER. Answer my question so I may be able to vote intelligently.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not speak for the committee in this respect, but in my judgment the first they will bring forward, if they are permitted to do so, will be the bill to secure the remainder of the public lands to actual settlers. The next will be the bills declaring the forfeiture of railroad land grants to the extent of some 30,000,000 acres.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman answer?

Mr. HOLMAN. The time is all farmed out now.

Mr. PARKER. Will the committee be permitted to bring forward the bills they may regard as privileged?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have said the committee will bring forward the general land bills. They will bring forward the homestead and forfeiture bills.

Mr. PARKER. What bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. All I ask is that it shall be left to the Committee on the Public Lands to determine what bills shall have precedence.

Mr. PARKER. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman make?

Mr. HOLMAN. To strike out all in regard to that particular bill; because to give a day to that committee to bring forward that bill only, or give it priority, would not be any benefit to the important public bills in relation to the public land and the forfeiture of the railroad land grants.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas (Mr. MCRAE) in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I perceive from the reading of the resolution that the Committee on Rules have assigned the time, or largely disposed of the time, to several committees named, while one of the most important committees of this House, and before which is pending the greatest mass of legislation, is assigned no time. I rise now to ask if it is competent for me to move an amendment to strike out "Pacific Railroads" where it occurs in the resolution and insert in lieu thereof the words "Invalid Pensions?"

The SPEAKER. That would be in order if the gentleman could get the floor in his own right to offer the amendment, but the gentleman from Arkansas is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and hope the House will give me its attention for a few moments. The resolution that I introduced asking for the consideration of the bill H. R. 6897 was not presented on my own account, but had been adopted and authorized by the Committee on the Public Lands, of which my friend from Indiana is the distinguished chairman. I believe that he is the only member of the committee who does not favor the resolution giving consideration to the bill in question. The bill was favorably reported nearly two months ago, and the resolution asking for consideration adopted early in last month. I was greatly surprised when the gentleman offered the amendment, the adoption of which would tend to defeat the expressed wishes of his own committee. But his conduct in attempting to make the House believe that the Committee on Public Lands does not wish the bill considered astonished me. He neither spoke for the committee nor reflects its wishes upon this subject. I am authorized to speak for the committee and believe I voice the wishes of a large majority of them when I say the amendment should not be adopted. Since the committee has already voted to consider the bill why ask them to change it?

Mr. HOLMAN. I only expressed my belief, and said especially that I did not speak by authority of the committee.

Mr. MCRAE. You only speak for a minority of one of and against your own committee, but as you are the chairman and failed to tell the House that the resolution which gave the Committee on Rules jurisdiction had been authorized by your committee, at the same time passing the importance of other bills, the impression was made that the amendment came from the committee through you and not from you individually. You have never asked the House for time for any forfeiture bills. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that all of the bills to which my friend has referred are privileged. They may be taken up at any time under the rules. I undertake to say that the committee and this House will take them up and consider them at an early date, but do not believe that either the Committee on Public Lands or the House will suffer them to be used to defeat other just and meritorious measures like the one under consideration. These privileges should be used to secure legislation and not to defeat bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not fair to leave to the committee to determine its own action with reference to the consideration of such matters?

Mr. MCRAE. The committee has already determined it. They authorized me to report the resolution. Why do you want to send it back to the committee for consideration again?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see that this would have that effect. The committee can determine what other bills to take up, and not be confined exclusively to the consideration of one.

Mr. MCRAE. They have agreed to this; and it is trifling with the committee and with the individual members of the committee interested in this bill, and who would like to have the matter adjusted, to offer such an amendment.

There is nothing, Mr. Speaker, in the bill that is objectionable to any man. It only provides for the adjustment of certain rights of the swamp-land States under grants made thirty years ago. It does not enlarge the grant, but provides for a settlement.

Mr. HOLMAN. My State is interested when the gentleman speaks of individual members being interested in this bill, and I know that State would not ask to have it taken up and given preference at this late date in the session to bills of great public concern.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not know what the State of Indiana may do, but I know that the majority of the committee want it considered. It can not be considered without time is given them either by this or some similar resolution. An opportunity is here presented in obedience to the instructions of the committee to consider it; yet the gentleman proposes to cut off the consideration to make way for privileged matters yet behind and not reported to the House, and thus defeat it. If that is the object he has in view I want him to disclose it. I want him to say that is the reason, meet the issue squarely and fairly. If he thinks the day named for this bill is the only one he can ever get, then let him join me in asking that the original resolution be passed and I will agree not to call up this bill on the 12th. All I want is consideration. I do not antagonize his bill. I want them all, but I also want this one.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my friend believe that we have a chance to consider the bills reported by the committee of great national importance unless we can get a day for our general business?

Mr. MCRAE. I am willing to give the committee as many days as necessary. I have already said that I am willing to give the committee the day assigned here for this bill if we can get another day for the consideration of this measure. We want to antagonize no revenue or forfeiture bills nor any forfeiture bill, but we want consideration of this in obedience to the action of the committee. I think the House wants it considered, and I believe it to be unjust and unfair for the chairman of the committee to thus oppose it. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask the previous question upon the amendment.

Mr. COX. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand my friend to call the previous question upon the pending amendments?

The SPEAKER. There is but one pending.

Mr. COX. I would like to offer mine and have it included in the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. After we get through with this amendment I will make answer to that.

Mr. COX. But I am afraid that I will be left in the lurch then. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 10.

Mr. OATES. No quorum.

Mr. OATES and Mr. CANNON were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 160, noes 4.

Mr. OATES. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. OATES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 38, noes 97.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask for the reading of that portion of the resolution to which the amendment applies, as it will stand if the amendment is adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I will state that the effect will be simply to give to the Committee on the Public Lands their wish as to the order or consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the proposition as it will stand if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That Thursday, April 12, immediately after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands in such order as said committee may designate.

The question was taken on the adoption of Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 34, noes 100.

Mr. OATES. No quorum.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. OATES and Mr. CANNON.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 136.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for an amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not yield.

Mr. OATES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 27, noes 98.

Mr. OATES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 18—not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. To save time, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. OATES. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

Mr. DIBBLE. I make the point that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that when a motion to suspend the rules is pending only one motion to adjourn is in order. After the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn is announced, the rule provides that the Chair shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the vote is taken on suspension.

Mr. OATES. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. REED and Mr. OATES as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 156, noes 7.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes are allowed for debate on each side, if gentlemen desire to avail themselves of that time. [Cries of "No!"] The question, then, is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays are asked.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 44; not voting 125; as follows:

R. 2927) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., with amendments, had requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. SAWYER, Mr. VEST, and Mr. HARRIS.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed an act (S. 2562) to appropriate a sum of money sufficient to carry out the provisions of the act approved March 5, 1888, entitled "An act for the purchase of a site, including the building thereon, also for the erection of the necessary store-houses for the use of the office of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army at the city of Washington, D. C.;" in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 3191) granting a pension to Mary S. Logan; and

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Whereas the people of the District of Columbia are subjected to taxation without representation, contrary to a fundamental principle of all free government: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XVI.

SECTION 1. The District of Columbia shall be entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States by one Senator, and by one or more Representatives, according to the rule of apportionment established by Article XIV of the Constitution. Said District shall also be entitled to as many electors for President and Vice-President of the United States as it has members of Congress.

SEC. 2. Congress shall provide by law the time and manner of choosing the Senator, the Representative or Representatives, and the electors authorized by this article.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I inclose herewith a draught of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring representation in Congress and in the electoral college upon the people of the District of Columbia.

It will be noticed that the proposed amendment does not touch the question of local government for the District, but leaves that matter, where it is now, with Congress. It simply aims to confer upon the people of the District some voice in the legislature which makes their laws and imposes their taxes, and in the election which determines who shall supervise the execution of these laws.

There is no good reason that I can see why the people of the District, now estimated at a quarter of a million in number, should be relieved of the common duties or denied the common rights of other citizens, but many why they should not. They are protected and taxed, go to war and conduct themselves in peace, like others; and who shall say they are not equally intelligent and patriotic? To excuse such a people from political duties and to hold them in political slavery is not only injurious to them, but to the whole people.

"From all the history of the European world since the later days of the Roman Republic," says Professor John Fiske in his article on "The Beginnings of the American Revolution," in the March number of the Atlantic, "there is no more important lesson to be learned than this, that it is impossible for a free people to govern a dependent people despotically without endangering its own freedom."

What is meant by governing despotically was stated at the beginning of the century by John Randolph:

"Political slavery," says Randolph, "has been well defined to be that state in which any community is divested of the power of self-government, and regulated by law to which its assent is not required and may not be given." And he adds, "This species of government is an experiment how far freemen can be reconciled to live without rights; an experiment dangerous to the liberties of these States."

According to general acceptation, slavery implies not only subjection, but that the superior power may appropriate the earnings of the enslaved without their consent. This is precisely what is done by taxation without representation. If a man or a body of men may levy a tax of 1 per cent. on other men's earnings without their consent, they may levy a tax of 10 per cent., or 50 per cent., or even 100 per cent. There is no limit. The governed are at the mercy of their governors.

This is despotism, pure and simple. Randolph declared such a state of things in the District to be dangerous to the liberties of the States themselves, and Professor Fiske says the teachings of history are against it. It is certainly a questionable example for a republic to set. It allows citizens to shirk their political duties. It teaches the young men of the District that they have no political responsibilities. When a District father now asks his son, fresh from the high school or the college, about his political rights and duties, he gets for answers, "What is that to me? I have no concern with such matters." Sometimes the answer is worse, indicating a feeling that political duties are somehow disreputable, if not actually degrading. They take notice of the ridicule heaped upon mistakes made in attempts to perform such duties. The changes are rung on "ward politicians" and "Willard Hall" meetings, until it has come to require some courage in the capital of the Republic for grown men even to confess that they favor a government of and by the people as well as for them. Every community has, no doubt, its turbulent classes and its cranks, but is that any reason why free government should be abandoned? Are the American people willing to have their capital made the center for fostering ideas adverse to their form of government? Is this the way that the exercise of despotism over a few people is to work out the overthrow of free government for the many? It looks like it.

But I did not intend, Mr. Senator, to argue the case in this letter, but desired only to submit a proposition to grant the rights of citizenship to the people of the national capital, with a view to its presentation to and consideration by the Senate.

Very respectfully,

APPLETON P. CLARK

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That the petition of John M. Payne praying for a pension, presented in the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

JOSEPH R. M'CREADY.

Mr. DOLPH. By request, I offer a resolution, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the United States Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint Joseph R. McCready, an employé of the Senate, a messenger, at a salary of $1,440 per annum, until further orders of the Senate; and that his salary be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there be no further morning business, I desire to move to take up Order of Business 69, which was passed over informally without losing its place. It is the bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If there is none, that order is closed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Senator from Ohio moves——

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask for the consideration of the resolution of which I gave notice yesterday.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator yield to me to withdraw a motion?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Certainly.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LAND GRANT.

Mr. STEWART. I ask leave to withdraw the motion submitted by me to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. 758) for the relief of purchasers and other grantees of the United States of certain swamp and overflowed lands, and to reimburse and indemnify certain States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion he entered to reconsider the vote by which the bill named by him was passed. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn.

MRS. HETTIE K. PAINTER.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I now ask——

Mr. PADDOCK. I rise to morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business will be received.

Mr. PADDOCK. From the Committee on Pensions, I am instructed to report the bill (H. R. 3839) granting a pension to Mrs. Hettie K. Painter with an amendment. I ask for its immediate consideration. It is amended to correspond with the Senate bill passed the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. Is there objection?

Mr. PLUMB. Let it be read.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I rose to morning business, and morning business does not include the presentation of bills for immediate consideration. I first yielded to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. I gave notice yesterday that I should ask the Senate this morning to extend to me that courtesy which Senators extend one to the other, and to take up a resolution which relates to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia object to the request of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will not object unless it takes time.

Mr. PADDOCK. It will take but a moment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I know the Senator does not mean to consume the time, but the Senator from Ohio has a bill pending, and I will ask the Senator if he will not allow the morning business to proceed in its regular course.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think if the Senator will hear me a moment he will withdraw his objection. This is a bill corresponding with a similar bill passed by the Senate the other day. It is the desire now to amend the House bill so as to correspond exactly in terms with the bill passed by the Senate. It will take but a moment. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I beg pardon of the Senator. I have not objected. I only stated that I did not want the morning hour consumed in the way in which it has been so frequently done. I want to insist upon taking up the resolution in relation to the fisheries treaty, which is before the Senate, and I shall ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon it. That is all I desire. I do not want to have the morning hour consumed. So far as the proposition the Senator makes is concerned, as I understand it now, I am neither in favor of it nor do I object to it; but I do not want to lose the opportunity of bringing before the Senate and having it pass this morning upon the resolution which provides that the fisheries treaty shall be considered in open session.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not understand the Senator from Virginia to object to the consideration of the bill reported by me.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from Virginia does not object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Virginia to object.

Mr. PADDOCK. No, sir; he does not.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not object, with the understanding we have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the amendment of that bill in accordance with the bill the Senate passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

CONSIDERATION OF THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I suppose I can now renew my motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would remind the Senator from Virginia that the resolution to which he refers is not morning business. It is on the Calendar, and can only be taken up by motion.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I made the motion, but yielded twice. I yielded first to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to present some morning business. I make the motion now to take up the resolution which provides for the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open session.

Mr. PLUMB. Is that in order until the morning business is concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia can not make the motion until the morning business is concluded. He can ask unanimous consent, the resolution being on the Calendar. If there be no further morning business that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending which motion the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him relative to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. After this bill is taken up I shall have no objection to the consideration of that resolution. Is the bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the question be put on taking up the bill, and then I shall not object to give way to the resolution of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill moved by the Senator from Ohio is before the Senate. No objection being made, that bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the Senator from Virginia now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him relative to the consideration of the fisheries treaty. The resolution will be read.

Mr. HOAR. That requires unanimous consent, I suppose?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I guess not, according to the ruling of the Chair awhile ago.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution submitted by Mr. RIDDLEBERGER March 22, 1888, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of Rules XXXVI, XXXVII, and XXXVIII as provide for executive sessions be suspended during the consideration of the fisheries treaty when the same shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire how the resolution of the Senator from Virginia comes before the Senate except by unanimous consent, when the Senate has under consideration the bill called up by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under Rule VIII the Chair thinks it is in order to move at any time to proceed to the consideration of any business on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. That displaces the order moved by the Senator from Ohio. It absolutely annuls the previous order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A majority of the Senate can do that at any time under Rule VIII.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Virginia will allow a vote to be taken upon the Freedman's Bank bill, and then I shall vote with him to take up the resolution, as it has been pending here some time, and I think it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. After the morning hour I know it requires unanimous consent, but during the morning hour it does not.

Mr. HARRIS. Was the motion of the Senator from Ohio carried to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was not formally submitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill was taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. My only question was whether it was before the Senate for consideration. If so, then I should think the motion of the Senator from Virginia was not in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Freedman's Bank bill was before the Senate by unanimous consent. The Chair put the question distinctly and it was taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asked if there was objection, and none was stated. It was then announced that the bill was before the Senate, but there was no formal vote taken. The Chair has no doubt that the Senator from Virginia has a right to make his motion under the rule.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I made the motion long ago. I do not propose to be dragooned in this Senate Chamber by anybody. I propose to make a statement right on this floor that I did not intend to make when I came here. It is this: That I have never understood this process of beating honest legislation by parallels. I know that after the morning hour has passed the silver bill comes up. I gave notice yesterday that I would call up the resolution to-day, in order that those who were opposed to it might absent themselves and not draw upon the courage which they lack to vote for it.

Mr. President, this is not a proposition that should go into executive session. It is a resolution looking only to the abrogation of three rules—Rules XXXVI, XXXVII, and XXXVIII—during consideration of the fisheries treaty. I ask that the Senate shall vote upon it. I have deferred now for nearly two weeks. If I have not been as earnest during that time as other Senators, and if I shall be reminded of it by any Senator, I shall certainly defer.

This proposition has been beaten from time to time, as it has been for the five years I have been here, by just the same kind of parliamentary tactics that it is endeavored to methodize here now. If the Senate is prepared to say that it will not consider the fisheries treaty in open session, and says it at once, there is no one more ready to yield than I. I ask for nothing but a consideration of the resolution. I ask for nothing but a yea-and-nay vote upon it.

Four or five times I was asked to let this matter go over because the Senate was not, if I may so express it, full. So I gave the notice I did yesterday; and it seems to me that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and especially the revered representative of the shore-fisheries of Massachusetts, should be ready to vote for this proposition or to vote against it. They have considered it, I have no doubt, more thoroughly than I; but I do not propose for one to defer one day to the Committee on Foreign Relations unless they shall show some deference to the Senate when they kept a proposition and did not report it back and defeated it by looking over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and bringing up something else. They have that treaty, and it is the right of the American people to know what their report is, and it is the right of the representatives of the American people here who pass upon treaties to consider it.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to take up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the Senator from Virginia asks that the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

Mr. TELLER. On the motion to take up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the pending question on agreeing to the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And to suspend the rules. That being so, under the rule providing for that purpose, as I wish to submit some observations to the Senate and not to the public——

Mr. TELLER. We can not hear the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the Chair states that the question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Virginia——

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, with due deference to my friend from Vermont, that that is an error. The motion was to take up the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Ohio to say that, if the bill to which he called attention were taken up, he was willing to yield for the purpose of the consideration of the resolution moved by the Senator from Virginia, and that resolution was then laid before the Senate. The Chair supposes that the question would be properly taken on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I only wish to say that I merely agreed that the question should be brought before the Senate whether the Senate would proceed to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, then, will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question being on agreeing to this resolution, I wish to submit some observations to the Senate which I do not desire to submit to Her Majesty's minister just at present. I therefore move that the doors be closed, if I can get a second.

Mr. HAWLEY. I second the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved and seconded that the doors of the Senate be closed. In pursuance of the rule on that subject, the Chair directs that the galleries of the Senate be cleared and the doors closed. The Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order.

The Senate, with closed doors, proceeded to consider the resolution.

After two hours and seventeen minutes the doors were reopened.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer for adoption the following resolution, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That, subject to the business of the morning hour, the order of business in the Senate shall be—

First. S. 2083, a bill to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Second. S. 185, a bill to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union, and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

Third. S. 1216, a bill providing for the investment of certain sums in the Treasury.

Mr. PLUMB. Let that lie over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1678) to authorize the purchase of a site for a public building at Buffalo, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 3191) granting a pension to Mary S. Logan;

A bill (H. R. 3470) to authorize the construction of bridges over the rivers St. Mary's, Satella, Little Satella, and Crooked, in the States of Georgia and Florida; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 77) to supply the Department of State with copies of bills and other documents.

PURCHASE OF BONDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5034) to provide for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER] that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER (when his name was called). I beg leave to announce that I am paired on all political questions with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BLODGETT], and on all other questions the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is to announce his colleague's pair or state how his colleague would vote, and I am to be governed by it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I think my colleague would vote "yea" on this question if present.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I should vote "nay," and I therefore refrain from voting.

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is absent from the Senate by reason of indisposition. I agreed yesterday with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] that I would take care of his pair. I voted "nay" on this question, feeling perfectly satisfied that that Senator would vote the same way if present. I will allow my vote to stand, but I announce the general pair.

Mr. BLACKBURN (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I remember that I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], and as I do not know how he would vote if present I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws his vote.

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is absent with a committee of the Senate. Ordinarily he is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], but on this question he is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is paired with my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Nevada], on this question.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Iowa came to me and stated that he was paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. STEWART. Then he is paired with two.

Mr. COCKRELL. I could not hear what the Senator from Nevada said.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was paired with my colleague, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. I made that pair for them on all questions involved in this bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that pair standing. I only want to be put right before the Senate myself.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] generally upon questions where his colleague [Mr. ALLISON] would say I should withhold my vote. On this question I vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. According to the statement of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], of course my colleague is paired with the colleague of that Senator on this particular question, so that the Senator from Missouri is at liberty to vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have already voted.

Mr. BECK (after having voted in the negative). I am paired generally with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. He is necessarily absent on committee work of the Senate, but I am told the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] is not paired, and that he would vote "nay" on this proposition if present. Therefore, I pair him with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who would vote "yea," if present, and my vote will stand.

Mr. SABIN. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr.

KENNA]. With the consent of his colleague I transfer the pair to the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD], and vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were here, I should vote "nay." If he would vote the same way I should record my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I stated a moment since that I was satisfied the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] would vote the same way I had voted, if he were present. Since that time I have learned that the probabilities are he would vote the other way upon this motion. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] informs me that the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] is absent, and had requested to be paired, and that the Senator from California if present would vote "nay." I therefore transfer the pair to the Senator from California, with the assent of the Senator from Nevada, and let my vote stand; otherwise I should withdraw it.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] is paired with my colleague [Mr. KENNA].

Mr. HARRIS. That being the case, I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws his vote.

Mr. CALL. I wish to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. PASCO] with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] is absent, and I think generally is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is absent, and I believe is generally paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH].

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish to state that I have transferred the pair of my colleague to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], so that both the Senator from California [Mr. STANFORD] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] can vote on this question.

Mr. HARRIS. I then record my vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK. I vote "nay."

The result was announced, yeas 20; nays 31, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add the following as additional sections to the bill.

SEC. —. That any person may deposit at any mint or assay office of the United States, either gold or silver bullion, or both, in quantities of not less than 5 ounces of gold or 80 ounces of silver, and demand and receive coin certificates therefor. The price to be paid for gold bullion, in exchange for certificates, shall be at the rate of $1 for 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine; the price to be paid for silver bullion, in exchange for certificates, shall be stated by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st and 15th day of each calendar month, and when either of these days shall fall on Sunday, or any other holiday, such statement shall be made on the following secular day, and the price so stated shall be equal to the average quotations of silver in the New York City market during the fifteen days next preceding such statement: Provided, That the price stated by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed $1 for 412½ grains of silver nine-tenths fine. Bullion below the standard value deposited under the provisions of this section may be reduced to the required fineness at the several mints and assay offices of the United States, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at the same cost to the depositor as is now charged for reducing gold bullion to the standard required for coinage.

SEC. —. That the coin certificates issued under the provisions of this act shall be of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That they shall not be of less denomination than one dollar or more than one thousand dollars, and that one-half of the amount issued shall be of denominations less than fifty dollars, and shall be redeemable in gold or silver coin at the option of the United States. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be coined from time to time such portion of the bullion deposited under the provisions of this act as may be necessary to enable him to furnish coin for the redemption of such certificates. All coin certificates issued under the provisions of this act shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for all dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in contracts heretofore made.

Mr. PLATT. By whom was the amendment proposed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. PLATT. I thought he had an amendment pending——

Mr. STEWART. This is the only one. I substitute it for the former amendment.

Mr. PLATT. Is it the same amendment which was pending the other day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is the amendment proposed to the bill by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], which is the pending question.

Mr. PLATT. Is it the exact amendment which he proposed at a former day?

Mr. STEWART. It is modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] has proposed to amend the amendment. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 17 of the first section of the proposed amendment strike out the words "four hundred and twelve and one-half" and insert "five hundred and forty-one;" so as to read:

Provided, That the price stated by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed $1 for 541 grains of silver nine-tenths fine.

Mr. HARRIS. Whose amendment is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, so that we may not misunderstand this matter I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada, in accordance with suggestions made yesterday, whether he will not consent to allow his amendment to remain unacted upon until the bill is reported to the Senate, at which time I gave notice that I would offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment already adopted, offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I can only offer my substitute in the Senate, the amendment having been adopted in Committee of the Whole; and if I offer that perhaps the Senator from Nevada may be willing either to withdraw for the time being his own amendment or modify it. He can offer it in the Senate just as well.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Illinois has offered an amendment to my amendment, and I do not know that I have the power to withdraw it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, you have.

Mr. STEWART. When an amendment is pending to it?

Mr. HARRIS. Unmistakably.

Mr. BECK. Undoubtedly the Senator has the right to withdraw it.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state to the Senator from Nevada that he has a perfect right to offer his amendment in the Senate if he chooses to do so after the bill is reported, and he waives no right by withdrawing it now.

Mr. STEWART. With the permission of the Senate, I will withdraw my amendment temporarily with a view of offering it in the Senate or not, depending upon the condition of the bill after the Senate has further considered it. If the bill shall be satisfactory without it I will not offer it. I wish to state further in connection with it that I believe——

Mr. REAGAN. I have offered an amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). Will the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REAGAN. I thought the Senator from Nevada had withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I was on the floor and was about to make some remarks. I do not wish to withdraw my amendment unless we can have all the amendments withdrawn except the one that has been adopted. Let the bill be reported to the Senate at once, and then both the Senator from Texas and myself can judge whether we will offer any amendment or not. I suggest to the Senator from Texas to withdraw his amendment and I will withdraw mine, and let the bill be reported immediately to the Senate.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. STEWART. Let the bill be reported immediately to the Senate. I wish to say that I believe my amendment is the best proposition that can be offered—it closes the whole financial question; but I am only one of the Senate, and I am always willing to agree with the majority of my friends. If they should put an amendment on the bill that seems to be a gain for silver, I would not embarrass them by offering further amendments to the bill, as there appears to be a disposition to get the bill through with as slight amendment as possible.

With the understanding that all amendments will be withdrawn I withdraw mine, and I hope that the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 2 of the "act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes," which is as follows: "That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled," was intended to be a permanent provision of law, and the same is hereby declared to have been since its enactment and to be now in full force and effect.

Mr. PLUMB. May I make a suggestion to the Senator as to his amendment? Let it read "was intended to be and was a permanent provision" of law.

Mr. SPOONER. To say "was intended to be" and has been and is now "in full force and effect" covers it entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I inquire what is the condition of the bill? Do I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Nevada has been withdrawn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was withdrawn.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Have any other amendments been agreed to save the one proposed by the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. HARRIS. What was the vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was adopted. Everything was stricken out after the enacting clause, and the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. As a substitute for the whole bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that amendment be read again, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, made as in Committee of the Whole, was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 2 of the "act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes," which is as follows: "That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled," was intended to be a permanent provision of law, and the same is hereby declared to have been since its enactment and to be now in full force and effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The question is, Will the Senate concur in this amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. TELLER. What is the question, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which amendment was a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. TELLER. I want to know, then, what has become of the amendments put on the original bill? They go with the bill, I suppose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All have been stricken out and the words just read inserted.

Mr. BECK. I propose to offer the following as an additional section——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question to be taken is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair begs leave to suggest that the question may as well be taken upon that, and then the Senator from Kentucky can offer his amendment.

Mr. BECK. I understood, and I think it was generally understood, though we were in the midst of confusion, that the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin was in the nature of a substitute. I did not know, though, that it was a substitute for the whole bill as it had been amended, and I do not think anybody here knew it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's motion is in order as an amendment to this amendment. The first question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky as an amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, if he offers it in that form.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That whenever the circulation, or any portion thereof, of any national bank, not in liquidation, shall be surrendered, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, at the market price thereof, an equivalent amount in silver bullion in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000 worth per month for coinage purposes, which shall be coined and used as provided in the act passed February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and restore its legal-tender character."

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Senator if he will not let the question be taken on concurrence in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole before that amendment is offered?

Mr. BECK. I do not care how the question is taken. All I desire is to dispose of the original bill with the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], and therefore instead of offering that as a substitute for the Plumb amendment, I now offer it as an additional section to the bill as it now stands.

Mr. HARRIS. It can be offered after the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is acted upon.

Mr. BECK. It can be done now as well as at any other time, and I prefer to do it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CULLOM. What is the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The main question before the Senate is on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in the amendment there made; and the Senator from Kentucky offers an amendment thereto. The first vote is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I asked the question because I wanted to know whether the Senator was offering his amendment now or withholding it till we acted on the amendment made in committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands he prefers to offer it now.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky, to save all doubts about the matter, the following amendment to his amendment:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall alter or repeal said act of February 28, 1878.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is an amendment in the second degree now.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have this amendment added.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Nevada will allow me to suggest to him that I see no reason why he may not offer his amendment after the action of the Senate upon the pending amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Perhaps the Senator from Kentucky will accept this as a modification of his amendment. I appeal to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HARRIS. That he can do; but it is not in order to offer it as an amendment to an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Kentucky modify his amendment by adding this?

Mr. BECK. I see no objection to that clause, but I see no use for it. I am willing to say it, because there is no intention to work the repeal of that act.

Mr. STEWART. It is only a matter of precaution. Will you accept it?

Mr. BECK. I will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky accepts the proposition of the Senator from Nevada as part of his amendment. The addition proposed will be read.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it all be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, as it now stands, will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall alter or repeal said act of February 28, 1878.

So as to make the proposed amendment read:

SEC. 2. That whenever the circulation, or any portion thereof, of any national bank, not in liquidation, shall be surrendered, and the same is not taken up by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, at the market price thereof, an equivalent amount in silver bullion in excess of the minimum of two million dollars' worth per month for coinage purposes, which shall be coined and used as provided in the act passed February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and restore its legal-tender character:" Provided, That nothing in this act shall alter or repeal said act of February 28, 1878.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this is an important matter, and we should precisely understand the effect of the proposition before we vote upon it. As I understand, the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, which has already been adopted in Committee of the Whole, disposed of all the bill and the amendments then pending, whether adopted or not.

Mr. HARRIS. I can not hear the Senator from Ohio at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is so much confusion in the Chamber that both Senators and reporters, and the clerks also, complain.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the effect of it, I can see that the language used by the Senator from Wisconsin is much more clear and much more satisfactory probably to both sides of the Chamber than the language employed in the original bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives. It makes it clear and explicit that the Secretary of the Treasury has now, and has had since the passage of the act of March 3, 1881, the unqualified right to go into the market and buy bonds with any surplus revenue on hand. It states that proposition very clear, so that if it be adopted the doubts of the President will be removed, all hesitation on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise the power will be removed and his duty made clear and plain. Therefore, so far as that amendment is concerned, I heartily approve of it and believe that it is better than the original text of the bill.

But now the consideration comes up as to whether we should complicate that simple proposition, so important at this moment to the business interests of the country, and to the interest, I may say, of every workingman and of every citizen of the United States, that the power to invest the surplus money should be clearly provided for. Its exercise must be beneficial to the United States. The power to purchase bonds at any reasonable price, if exercised judiciously by the Secretary of the Treasury at the present market rate, would be ample and sufficient to dispose of all the surplus revenue, and prevent the further accumulation of money in the Treasury. It seems to me that it is better simply to do that now, and to postpone the consideration of the question presented by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] until a more convenient season.

To-day, as I supposed with the general assent of the Senate, though not with the unanimous consent of all, I proposed a rule which would enable the Senate within a week or ten days to take up and consider this proposition as well as any other of a financial character, in the third order of business provided in the resolution I offered. I think I can see some objections to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, although they may not occur to him, and probably he may not agree with me about them, but I think in the practical working of his amendment there will be some difficulty.

While I am not opposed to the principle of purchasing silver bullion at market price and making it a basis of silver certificates, yet it does involve two questions of very serious difficulty. Is it wise for us to continue to coin the silver bullion into dollars when purchased? I am very clearly of the opinion that it would not be wise. Assuming that it is wise to use a portion of the surplus money in the Treasury in the purchase of silver bullion and to issue certificates based upon that bullion, so as to take the place of the United States notes deposited in the Treasury upon the retirement of bank circulation, yet it does not seem to me wise to continue the coinage of the silver dollar, except as demanded by the public necessities and for public use.

We have now—I have not the exact figures before me—over $200,000,000 of the silver dollars in the Treasury and in the various depositories, mainly here, in San Francisco, and in the city of New York. We have $60,000,000 in addition in circulation. Experience has shown that with every effort made to circulate the silver dollar only a certain amount, from $50,000,000 to $60,000,000, has been taken by the people, because the people of the United States have become so accustomed to the use of paper representatives of silver and of gold that it is not worth while to coin in excess of the probable demand for circulation.

If the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky was stripped of that feature and the silver bullion was purchased and deposited in the Treasury, which can be done in a more convenient form, at less expense, occupying less space, with less danger in storage, that would remove one of the objections I have to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. When the silver bullion is received at the Treasury it is in the most portable form possible for storage and for use in coinage, if it be necessary to coin; but why coin it into silver dollars at an expense of 1½ cents on every dollar, which aggregates in the large sum that would be purchased under this bill more than $1,000,000? Why change the form from silver bullion, nine-tenths fine, ready at any time to be minted by the Treasury? Why convert it into silver dollars?

His proposition requires this bullion to be coined. If you add to the requirements now made upon the mints you might make it extremely difficult without a very great enlargement of the capacity of the mints to coin the money. It requires the full employment of all the force provided in the mints now to coin the $2,000,000 a month provided for by law, and the necessary subsidiary coin, although not much of that is coined, and the gold coin and the other minor coins. Why, therefore, convert the silver bullion into silver dollars? Will it strengthen the Treasury? Will it give silver any greater value? I say not. This bullion can be stored away instead of coin. It is cheaper for the Government to do that, more convenient in every respect, and it accomplishes the same object of getting out a substitute in the form of silver certificates in the place of the bank-notes retired. That feature of the amendment, it seems to me, ought to be considered.

There is another thing to be considered—the irregularity of these purchases. Sometimes the hoarding of United States notes by being deposited in lieu of bank-notes may be $1,000,000 a month, sometimes it may be $4,000,000 or $5,000,000. In the last two or three years it has sometimes been very large and sometimes very small. Why require the bullion purchased as security for these notes to be immediately coined into silver dollars? It makes a changeable and difficult problem.

Then, besides, here is another vital question that is presented by this amendment, which ought to be considered with the utmost care, and that is whether we should substitute in the place of silver certificates and gold certificates a single form of certificate called coin certificates. If this proposition is adopted it will present to every holder of a gold certificate the serious problem which he will decide according to his own interest, whether the coin certificate into which this bullion is put does not make a new kind of certificate different in intrinsic value from the present gold certificate. The great body of the holders of gold bullion will naturally deposit it and take for it a gold certificate, because, whether it is more valuable or not, it is thought to be more valuable. It is certainly more valuable in foreign exchanges.

Your silver certificate and your coin certificate will not go abroad except as the representative of so much silver, while gold certificates are now used in nearly all large transactions in New York. More than 69 per cent. of all the payments made for customs duties in the city of New York is made in gold certificates. Is it desirable to lessen the use of these gold certificates? Is it desirable to make it the interest of every holder of gold certificates to surrender them for gold coin, lest their value may be impaired? I think not.

It seems to me that as these two forms of certificates have been used for different purposes, but kept by the Treasury at par with each other, the gold certificates held largely for clearing-house payments and for customs payments in large sums—some being of the denomination of $10,000 in a single certificate—the result of this new issue might be to drive out the gold certificates. The holders of these certificates might present them for redemption, and thus withdraw from storage in the vaults of the Treasury the gold of the country and create alarm and distrust.

Now, sir, I am as much in favor of bimetallic money as any man in the United States. I believe that both silver and gold are absolutely necessary to carry on the exchanges of our country. We must know, in the present condition of the monetary affairs of the world, that gold certificates and gold only are the representatives of our foreign commerce, and unless we want to make a gap between the silver and the gold certificates it is better to maintain in circulation that form of certificates to which our business men have become accustomed, and let them both play their part side by side with each other.

As long as the Government of the United States maintains them at their relative value with each other, par for par, they will be taken in all commercial exchanges in our country; but if, on the other hand, you induce the surrender of the gold certificates and the withdrawal of gold to that extent from the Treasury of the United States, you tend to bring about a single silver standard, the very result that is feared, and has been feared by many wise business men, not only in this country but in other countries.

I had hoped we should adhere to the solution agreed upon by general understanding, as I thought, and postpone for a week or two the consideration of this important question, and see how far the proposition now submitted by the Senator from Kentucky should be modified or changed, so as not to disturb the monetary business of the country. I think, therefore, and I appeal to the Senate as a deliberative body, whether it is not better to let this bill now as it stands, unobjectionable in terms in every respect, go to the President of the United States to be approved, and let the Secretary of the Treasury at once then proceed to the duty invoked by the bill of buying bonds.

If that is done quietly and in the ordinary way in which it has been done in the past, without the sounding of timbrels or the announcement beforehand, he may go on and purchase bonds, so that there will be a very large saving in interest to the people of the United States. Let this simple bill take its course and have its effect. When you add to it the silver question, a proposition so important as this, without full consideration by the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States, it seems to me you make embarrassment which may end in distrust and disaster and perhaps in overthrowing our bimetallic currency and landing us on the silver basis alone, with gold hoarded, or exported, or held at a premium in silver.

I do not intend to debate the subject further, although I am entirely prepared to go over the whole ground, if desired; but I appeal to Senators whether it is not better to leave this proposition, though plausible and designed for a good purpose, to prevent any further contraction of our currency by the retirement of bank-notes—whether it is not better to let it go to the Committee on Finance in the usual way?

There is a bill now on your table, reported unanimously from the Committee on Finance, and which, as modified, meets now, as I am told, the sanction of the Treasury Department and the executive officers, and that is that the Secretary of the Treasury may whenever the circumstances demand it invest what is called the fund deposited by national banks in liquidation, amounting to about $100,000,000. That bill is lying on your table reported, as I said, unanimously. It will present the financial question in a way that we can deal with it; and the proposition I have laid upon your table to-day will enable us within a week or ten days to take up that bill, and make such modifications and additions to it as may be necessary.

Meanwhile we can study over carefully the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky and the other propositions which have been made, and make such provisions as are desirable after full consideration. We may then pass a measure dealing with all these different questions and let it go to the House of Representatives, and it will be very likely to receive the considerate approval and judgment of the American people.

A grave proposition like this presented now, without consideration by any committee where at least two or three objections are pointed out, seems to me will only disturb rather than quiet the public apprehension. That is the only feeling that affects me. I have no desire to oppose the substance of the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, to issue silver certificates upon silver bullion bought at market value, but I do think the form, the nature, the extent, and the limitations of that proposition ought to be very carefully studied over.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I congratulate the country upon the declaration of the Senator from Ohio, that he is favorable to silver, and I assure him that there will be plenty of opportunities to procure a silver bill which shall have the element of free coinage of silver without limitation other than the amount of production of silver and gold. There will be an opportunity to do that, and I expect from what the Senator from Ohio has said that he will help to accomplish that great end which I think entirely necessary to the prosperity of the country.

I am a little surprised, however, that he should be alarmed about the driving of gold out of the country. That is the old argument. That was the argument used by Chevalier and others against the use of gold, that it would drive silver out of France and out of England, particularly out of France. Chevalier wrote books for ten or fifteen years to show that the better metal, silver, would be driven out of the market by gold, and France would be the sufferer. The same ground will always be taken by monometallists. The particular metal that they choose as the standard, they will claim without argument is the better metal, that it is the only standard, and they assume broadly that the use of the other metal will drive the better metal out of the country.

That has not been verified here. But if it should be verified, if the gold should be driven out of the country, in case you brought prosperity in I do not think anybody would be materially harmed. Silver has been used through the ages as the leading basis of circulation. It has been prized more highly than gold and there are more countries that have had it. It has a better record, because it is a more stable production, more certain, less liable to fluctuation, and it is so held by all who have examined the subject so far as that is concerned.

Now, I am in favor of the free coinage of silver and I am in favor of sending with this bill, which has a good deal of poison in it, the poison of contraction, the antidote. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] very propetly made the suggestion that there should be an antidote, and he proposed legal-tender notes. He now is content that we shall have silver instead of legal-tender notes, which I think a very important change. The Senate by a large majority voted for his amendment, because they were unwilling to pass this bond bill and send the Administration into the market to buy up $150,000,000—for they will be driven to that—of outstanding bonds, thus putting up the price of bonds and thereby necessarily cause their withdrawal as a basis of circulation for the national banks without providing some means of preventing that inevitable contraction.

If we did not pass anything else than this bill without the antidote, if there was no means by which another bill could be passed if it became complicated with other measures, if an antidote like this did not go with it, serious consequences would very likely happen to the country. By putting in this antidote requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver to supply this deficiency, we shall not interfere with silver legislation. It is only to prevent the evil effect which may necessarily follow from purchasing bonds to the extent of $150,000,000, that such a provision is insisted on here.

Within the last two years, as I have said before, $160,000,000 of national-bank notes have been retired, and the country is feeling it most keenly. The people of the Mississippi Valley, groaning under a load of mortgages to the extent of $1,200,000,000 as estimated by the best statistics, do not want a bill for contraction passed here unless the antidote goes with it; and when the Senator from Kentucky suggested that he would put that antidote in this bill, I agreed for the sake of harmony to withdraw all amendments, to strip the bill of everything but what was necessary to make it a harmless bill so far as the people are concerned, while it benefits the bondholders.

That is all there is in this amendment. Let this amendment go with the bill, and if there shall be further legislation, which I hope there will be, to give us free coinage of silver, we can mature it. This is certainly to supply a necessary gap. Otherwise we may pass no further legislation and be left to the tender mercies of contraction.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, after the speech which has been made by the Senator from Ohio it may be necessary that I should say a few words in regard to the amendment I have offered. When the bill was reported from the Finance Committee I was content to vote for it in any shape, either as it came from the House of Representatives or with the verbal amendments proposed by the committee, believing that all other questions could be presented on other bills on the Calendar and be legitimately discussed; therefore I voted to lay the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] on the table, announcing that amendments which I had myself intended to offer should not be offered.

The record shows that I was not only willing but anxious to vote for the bill just as it came from the committee. But the proposition to lay the amendment of the Senator from Kansas on the table was rejected by the Senate; it was discussed on its merits, and was made part of the bill by a vote of 29 to 21.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] then offered a very sweeping amendment, presenting the question of the unlimited coinage of silver—indeed, going further, of unlimited paper issue on silver bullion. That proposition was discussed to some extent. If the amendment of the Senator from Kansas which has been adopted in Committee of the Whole should remain, and it surely will unless my substitute for it is adopted, and if the amendment of the Senator from Nevada should also become a part of it, and it is only withdrawn temporarily, as I understand it, and if the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] brings up his proposition for discussion, as he surely will if my substitute or amendment is not agreed to, and he may do so even if it is, gentlemen who complain of my amendment would have something real to complain of.

I do not want to discuss the question of issuing more legal-tender notes; that question involves serious considerations. I did not think it wise on this bill to go into the question of the unlimited coinage of silver, or the substitution of bullion for coin. These grave questions can well be deferred to another time; but as the Senate had decided that in making the transition from national-bank currency, which the purchase of bonds involved, to some other circulation which must be supplied, we ought not to allow any contraction of the currency. I thought the safest thing for us to do was to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to do what he has authority to do now—increase the coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains, which is to day an unlimited tender for all debts, public and private, to the extent of the contraction caused by the retirement of the national-bank circulation. I assured Senators on both sides that I would make that proposition if the others were withdrawn.

That course seemed to be agreeable to the Senator from Kansas and to the Senator from Nevada, and, so far as I can understand, to the gentlemen who advocated either of those measures. Therefore, in good faith, after they had said to me that my amendment or substitute would be satisfactory, I have submitted it for the consideration of the Senate, in order to get out of the dilemma which I thought the discussion of the great questions presented by the other amendments would involve us in. Of course, if it is rejected all the others will be again urged. Therefore I repeat, I offered this amendment believing it to be the safest way out of the difficulties we are in; and if it is passed it will not, in my opinion, embarrass or delay the passage of the bill.

It asserts no new principle. It only provides that the currency shall not be contracted below the point it is now by substituting for retired bank-notes the use of one of the coins of the country which our officials have the right now to coin up to $4,000,000 a month, and are today obliged to coin at the rate of $2,000,000 a month. It does not authorize the coinage of any additional amount if the national-bank currency is not contracted. It may not be; if not, none of the additional silver will be coined; but if the national-bank currency is contracted, to that extent it seeks to supply the people with an equivalent in a coin which the Secretary now has the right to coin. I think, therefore, it is a simple way to avoid all the complicated questions presented by the other proposed amendments. I have said that I would have been glad if the bill could have passed as it came from the committee. I showed my good faith in that regard by my votes; but when that could not be done, I offered an amendment which I think avoids all serious difficulty and all complications.

Now the Senator from Ohio, making a new departure, says why not use silver bullion and issue currency on it? The Senator from Nevada argued for that; I never expected to hear the Senator from Ohio do so. I do not care to go into that question now. I do not propose so far as I can influence legislation either on this bill or any other to make any difference between the two coin metals of the Government, giving one a fixed value and treating the other as merchandise. Gold can be coined free of charge for anybody who presents bullion at the mint today. Any man, citizen or alien, can take it to any of our mints and have it coined without charge.

The Senator from Ohio knows there is no law in existence by which anybody can have silver bullion coined on any terms, or by which a single certificate can be issued upon silver bullion. Therefore, if the Senate should change my amendment from coin to bullion, the bullion could not be used for any purpose, as no certificate could issue, either under the act of 1878 or under the sundry civil bill that passed last year. Neither act authorizes the issuing of a single certificate upon bullion. Therefore all the contraction that we are seeking to guard against by this amendment, by the withdrawal of bank notes, would go on, no matter how much silver bullion we had lying in the Treasury, the bullion itself not being a legal tender for anything, no circulation being allowed to be issued on it either under the act of 1878 or under the act of 1887.

Therefore that proposition is simply an adroit way of destroying the practical effect of the amendment by insisting that bullion would answer as well as coin, and thus save the coinage, when the bullion would be of no value, and not a dollar of currency could be issued upon it, as the laws now stand, if we have twenty or thirty or one hundred millions of it lying in the Treasury. Do not let us deceive ourselves, and do not let us be deceived by suggestions that this does not mean to give practical relief against contraction. The Senator from Ohio will not rise in his place now and say that a single certificate could be issued upon bullion, nor will he say that all the silver bullion that we saw fit to buy would be available for any purpose to prevent the contraction of the currency.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to suggest that it could be done if it was provided for.

Mr. BECK. Of course you can pass laws to that effect if you please, but that is the very question we are now trying to avoid the consideration of. By the withdrawal of the amendment of the Senator from Nevada we are seeking not to discuss the matter of issuing certificates upon silver bullion on this bill, as that brings up very grave questions, which we are all anxious to avoid. The suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that silver bullion would better answer the purpose than silver coin is simply an effort to defeat this amendment without offering any substitute for it.

It is the old struggle to ignore and degrade silver coin in the interest of the single standard of gold. The Senator from Ohio says that gold certificates are now valuable, and men will not part with them. They are of little or no use to the people as currency, however valuable they may be to hold by men of wealth. Of the $99,000,000 or $100,000,000—I do not know the precise amount outstanding at this moment—but out of, say $100,000,000 of gold certificates outstanding, over $50,000,000 are in denominations of $10,000 each or over. No gold certificate can be issued for less than $20. Of the whole amount I have no doubt over three-fourths are in denominations of over $500 each, and the balance is in large denominations. Of course the official tables show, but I do not want to go into that.

I only desire now to give the Secretary the unquestioned right to invest the surplus revenue from time to time in the purchase of bonds, and thus save interest and keep existing circulation in use, and if in making such purchases the national-bank currency is contracted below what it is now, I seek to furnish a substitute for it, so that the present volume of our currency shall not be contracted by the means we adopt to get what already exists into use. Unless that is secured we may find our currency destroyed by the very efforts we are making to get it into circulation.

I have a bill now on the Calendar, which I propose to press whenever I can get it up, and it will be in order as an amendment to Mr. SHERMAN'S bill under the order of business suggested this morning, which substitutes coin certificates for gold and silver certificates, and allows no certificate to issue of over $500, and provides that three-fourths of all certificates issued shall be in denominations of $50 or under, so that the people can have the benefit of them as circulating notes and not have them held, as gold certificates are held now by the United States, simply as the insurer of a few rich men who seek to get clear of insuring their own gold by depositing it with us and making us take care of it at our expense with no benefit to the Government or the people. We now simply give them certificates while we are insuring their gold for them without pay and storing it at our expense. That I am opposed to. We might as well have none of these gold certificates, so far as the currency of the country is concerned.

The silver certificates provided for in this amendment will be in denominations of one, two, five, ten, and twenty dollars, denominations substantially similar to the smallest notes now issued by the national banks; because with the silver thus coined any man has a right to go and demand certificates in any denominations he sees fit and receive paper for his coin from the Treasury or any subtreasury of the United States.

There can be no objection to this amendment unless gentlemen seek to contract the currency by the bond-purchasing process, and no man will venture to admit that he does. No new principle is established or asserted. It is only a direction to do what the Secretary of the Treasury now has authority to do, and what he ought to do if contraction follows his purchases, to coin silver and issue certificates similar in denominations to the notes withdrawn by the national banks, and we only ask it to the extent that they are withdrawn and the currency is thereby contracted; I therefore repeat, that while I was willing to postpone the discussion of this question until the bill of the Senator from Ohio comes up, in regard to purchasing bonds with the greenbacks now locked up to cover national-bank circulation, good faith to the Senate and to the Senators who postponed their amendments so that mine could be first considered required that I should offer this amendment, especially as the amendment of the Senator from Kansas had been adopted in Committee of the Whole, and after the Senator from Nevada had withdrawn his in order to avoid serious questions and complications, as he avowed on the floor yesterday that he only did so because he would be content if my amendment was adopted.

It does not lie in the mouth of the Senator from Ohio or anybody else to intimate that I do not desire to pass this bill as promptly as possible. I insist that there is nothing in my amendment which either the President or the Secretary of the Treasury, or anybody else, can object to. I am not seeking to create any sort of embarrassment or delay in the passage of the bill. On the contrary, every purpose I have had has been to get it through on the best terms possible, first without amendment, but as that was not possible and amendments had to be adopted, then to offer one that nobody can properly object to, and seek to exclude all such amendments as might produce delay or embarrassment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Kentucky will notice that his amendment proposes:

That whenever the circulation, or any portion thereof, of any national bank, not in liquidation, shall be surrendered, and the same is not taken up, etc.

I suggest to the Senator that that phraseology is not as distinct as it should be. Therefore I will offer an amendment, if it be in order, after the word "surrendered," to insert "by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury."

Mr. BECK. I followed the language of the Senator from Kansas, and believing that it means exactly that, I have no objection to the words suggested, because that is what we both mean.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that will make it more definite. Then, in line 3, I would suggest to change the phraseology to read "and the same or an equivalent amount is not taken by," instead of "not taken up."

Mr. BECK. They could not take the same notes. There must be an equivalent. "The same amount" would do.

Mr. ALLISON. "The same or an equivalent amount is not taken by other national banks."

Mr. BECK. I have no objection to those words, because we both meant to do just that.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I hope the Senator will have no objection to accepting these modifications, because I think these words I propose will make the sense much clearer. I ask the Senator if he will accept those modifications?

Mr. BECK. I do not object.

Mr. ALLISON. I can not offer them, I believe, at this stage.

Mr. BECK. I desire the Senator from Iowa to put them in writing, and I will accept them.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will ask that they be inserted as I send the words to the desk. After the word "surrendered," in line 2, I wish to insert the words "by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury;" and in line 3, after the word "same," insert "or an equivalent amount," and in the same line strike out the word "up;" so as to read:

That whenever the circulation, or any portion thereof, of any national bank, not in liquidation, shall be surrendered, by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury, and the same, or an equivalent amount, is not taken by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that these amendments are accepted by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I understand the situation aright, the Senator from Kentucky has offered an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Nevada proposes an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky. I understand both those amendments are now pending, no action having been taken upon either.

Mr. BECK. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada has been withdrawn.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I was about to ask the Senator from Nevada to accept a substitute for his amendment, which I think will make it more satisfactory; but if it has been already withdrawn, of course there is no necessity for doing so.

Mr. STEWART. What is the modification?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I simply wish to restrict the coinage under this proposition to the $4,000,000 a month fixed as the maximum in the act of February 28, 1878.

Mr. STEWART. I should object to that.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, yesterday I made the strongest appeal I could to the Senate to accept the bill as it came to the Senate from the Committee on Finance. I have been followed to-day by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], making also an earnest appeal to the Senate not in any form to attempt to change the financial policy of the Government on a bill so important and so pressing as the one reported by the committee. I appeal now to the Senate not to add to this bill something which will result in a change of the entire financial policy of the Government.

It is said by the advocates of this amendment that the meaning of it is to prevent contraction; it is said that contraction of the currency must necessarily take place by reason of the application of the surplus in the Treasury to the purchase of bonds, and, as was said yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky, it was probable it would be applied first to the purchase of the 4½ per cent. bonds, they being of lower premium and therefore most likely to be purchased first. There are some $85,000,000 of the 4½ per cent. bonds held for the redemption of national-bank circulation. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, whatever currency shall be surrendered by the purchase of these bonds will be supplied by an issue of silver coinage, not alone by the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of certificates on that bullion, but the bullion shall be coined into standard silver dollars.

If there is any danger that this is to produce contraction the danger extends to this, that instead of $85,000,000 of national-bank circulation, behind which stand the 4½ per cent. bonds, you will have a new issue of silver coin to the extent of $85,000,000, perhaps within the first year; in other words, you disregard the limit fixed in the act of 1878, which was deemed the limit beyond which it was unsafe to go with respect to the coinage of the standard silver dollar, and even then the discretion was left to the Secretary of the Treasury not to go above the limit of $2,000,000 a month, but the act of 1878 permitted him to extend it to $4,000,000 a month. And now it is proposed to issue more than $4,000,000 per month additional to that now coined. In other words, if the 4½ per cent. bonds should be surrendered and purchased by the Government, and $85,000,000 of currency, for which the 4½ per cent. bonds are held as security, should be redeemed, then 85,000,000 of silver dollars must immediately be coined in addition to those now required to be coined. I wish to say in relation to that, if the Treasury of the United States within sixty days after that is done is not upon a silver basis pure and simple, and if gold is not at a premium, then all financial instruction we have had in the past is at fault.

If the Senate of the United States in this unwise, ill-timed, ill-digested manner, is determined to add to a bill which simply authorizes the President to employ the surplus, a provision to force the country into such a condition of affairs as this, then I say I will be surprised. Certainly the Senator from Ohio has already advised the Senate that there is no pressing necessity for such action upon this bill. Upon another bill which he has reported to the Senate and which to-day was made an early special order all these amendments may be offered, and incorporated in that bill if you please, but let it first be done after the Committee on Finance have thoroughly studied and investigated the subjects and reported the bill back to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have no desire to prolong this debate, and I do not care to say anything more, except in reply to the Senator from New Jersey, who speaks of this amendment as upsetting and endangering all the financial schemes of the Government. He has failed to show wherein it can, by any possibility, do so. There are only about $69,000,000 of the 4½ per cent. bonds now held as a basis of national-bank circulation. Ninety per cent. of that is all that is issued in the form of circulation.

Mr. McPHERSON. I took the Senator's own statement of yesterday.

Mr. BECK. I said $85,000,000 of 4½ percents were held for national-bank circulation and as security for the deposits made in national depositaries, and it so appears in the RECORD this morning. Therefore the circulation thereby secured can not amount to over $60,000,000 at the outside, if they give up every dollar they have; and they are obliged to retain a certain portion of their circulation if they propose to hold their national-bank charters at all. So by no possibility will it amount to more than one-half what the Senator from New Jersey suggests it may possibly amount to, and they may not retire their circulation to any appreciable extent.

As to this amendment overthrowing all the systems of finance of the Government, and as to gold fleeing from the country and gold soon being at a premium, we have heard that sort of talk periodically from the Senator from New Jersey for the last ten years, as we have heard from him about Jay Cooke's pronunciamentos, which he has held up to us as the law of the land, when all the leading lawyers of the Senate, including the Attorney-General and the courts of the country, have decided against him over and over again. He talks as though we were dishonoring ourselves by paying standard silver dollars, which formed the basis of the contract demanded by the bondholder himself, so that we could not reduce the quantity of silver which was in the silver dollar at the time that we determined to issue the bonds.

I do not propose to be lectured on the floor of the Senate in that sort of way without showing that there is no foundation for the charges made. As to gold fleeing from the country, we have $175,000,000 more gold added to our coinage since 1878 than we have coined silver since 1878; and because we do not propose to have our present volume of currency contracted by the withdrawal of the national-bank notes or put ourselves at the mercy of a system which for a long time sought to dominate this country and control its currency, we are told by the Senator from New Jersey that we are upsetting all the financial policy of the Government.

The banks are going to surrender part of their circulation, no doubt, because they can not make as much money as they used to do. They will sell their bonds and their notes will be surrendered. Have we not a right to say that something else shall take the place of those notes, and that it shall be the silver coin of the country and paper issues based thereon as now regulated by law, that being the coin in which all the national-bank notes are payable? They are not compelled to pay a dollar in gold upon their own notes. With the aid of the Senator from New Jersey and his distinguished friend from Ohio, whom he lauds as being par excellence the only man whose opinion is worth anything, they almost succeeded in striking down the greenback. Failing in that they sought to take away its legal-tender quality.

The bank-notes are now payable in lawful money, legal-tender not being, as they contended, a necessary quality of lawful money. Now, when the national banks have proved failures as fiscal agents to furnish currency, and the Comptroller admits they are failures for that purpose, when we say the currency we have and need shall not be taken away without some substitute being provided to the people, we are told that we are upsetting all precedents, destroying all confidences, nullifying all that has been done heretofore in carrying out the financial system of the country. I deny it. There is nothing in this amendment that indicates that we are taking one step in that direction.

Mr. McPHERSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I understand the Senator from Kentucky has accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, making it therefore a part of his own amendment, and I desire now to offer a further amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is an amendment to an amendment. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that his amendment is not now in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be an amendment in the third degree, and is not in order.

Mr. BECK. I was about to ask the Senator from Iowa whether to his amendment, which reads "shall be surrendered by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury," the words "or otherwise" ought not to be added?

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether he means that his amendment, or any part of it, relates to national-bank circulation still in existence, where the bank itself has already deposited United States notes?

Mr. BECK. I do not. It applies to the contraction which will take place hereafter.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to get at the understanding of the Senator. That is to say, his amendment applies to national-bank circulation that may hereafter come into the Treasury by the surrender of greenbacks or other arrangements that may be made between the Treasury Department and the banks.

Mr. BECK. That is it.

Mr. ALLISON. It has no relation whatever to greenbacks on deposit in the Treasury, against which national-bank notes are now outstanding?

Mr. BECK. It has not; and I think the Senator from Iowa agrees with me in that.

Mr. ALLISON. With that understanding I have no objection to inserting the words "or otherwise," as proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The suggested modification will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2 of the proposed amendment, after the word "surrendered," insert the words "by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury, or otherwise;" in line 3, after the word "same," insert the words "or an equivalent amount;" and in the same line strike out the word "up," after the word "taken;" so as to read:

That whenever the circulation or any portion thereof of any national bank not in liquidation shall be surrendered by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury, or otherwise, and the same, or an equivalent amount, is not taken by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Kentucky accepts these suggestions.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, some progress has been made since this matter was under discussion a week ago. The Senator from Ohio is not so certain now that the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky is not germane to the bill as it came from the Finance Committee, and seems to be willing to discuss the question upon its merits. I think that progress is worth noting. I am very much gratified at it myself, and think a concession of that kind from, if not the titular head of the Finance Committee, at all events from one entitled to rank as such in fact, has been a powerful contribution in the right direction.

I had no pride of opinion in the amendment which I offered, and when it was suggested that the same result, to wit, the maintenance of the present volume of paper money outstanding, could be accomplished in another way, I very cheerfully yielded; and I shall, therefore, most cheerfully support the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, as it has been amended by his suggestion and that of the Senator from Iowa.

If there were anything necessary besides what has been offered to show how very important this amendment is, I would ask Senators to turn to Senate bill 163, Calendar No. 736, reported from the Finance Committee, and which that committee has been talking about taking up to-day. I believe suggestions have been made that if anybody wanted to amend anything which came from that committee, he could amend that bill. Section 3 of that bill, as reported, reads as follows:

That when any national banking association shall deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, in the manner provided by law, the 2½ per cent. bonds authorized by this act, or any bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest, as security for its circulating notes, the association making such deposit shall be entitled to receive circulating notes, in manner, form, and denominations authorized by law, not exceeding in amount the par value of the bonds so deposited, etc.

If that should become a law, national bonds of all denominations and rates of interest would be enormously appreciated in value. The Senator from New Jersey who sits facing me will remember the debate we had on a similar proposition in this body, I think two years ago, in which I said then in regard to a proposition which he introduced, and which the Senate finally, on his motion, passed, that if it became a law the result of it would be to add at least 5 per cent. to the value of every dollar of United States bonds outstanding.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. Senate bill 163. It might fairly be entitled "A bill to increase the premium on national bonds outstanding."

But while that is true, no one could tell what other effect might follow. Of course the primary design is not to increase the premium upon the bonds, but it is to induce the national banks to take out more circulation, and thereby increase the volume of national-bank notes outstanding. But it might have—it would undoubtedly have in some cases—precisely that effect, for the very moment that the bonds began to appreciate in value, as they would as soon as they began to be purchased for this purpose, there would be the temptation on the part of the banks to realize the excess of premium created by this very act and throw them upon the market.

As I said, no one can tell what the effect of that might be upon the volume of the currency. It might immensely reduce it. It undoubtedly would in some cases. There would be periods when the currency would go down and other periods perhaps when it would go up. It would induce a fluctuation of amount beyond anything that has been known under existing law. For the purpose of that stability which ought to be the principal object in all legislation concerning currency, such a proposition as the Senator from Kentucky has now made or the one similar to it which I made the other day, and which the Senate voted into the bill, ought undoubtedly to be the accompaniment of this legislation, or at all events of some legislation.

There has been another gain, too, by reason of this discussion. The Senator from Ohio is not now so solicitous that there shall not be silver certificates. He is willing to admit that there could be more without impropriety, and that is a great gain. But he wants to have them based not upon coin, but upon bullion, and there he has made no progress. He is willing that there shall be an unlimited amount of gold coin, and that certificates shall be based upon gold coin alone, not upon gold bullion; but he insists that there shall be a distinction between gold and silver, applicable whenever and wherever this question of the relative merit comes up, whereby one shall be stigmatized—one shall be placed in a relation inferior to that of the other; and that, I take it, will be the only outcome of his suggestion that the amendment shall be so modified as to require the issuance of certificates upon bullion and not upon coin.

It is true, Mr. President, as true of gold as it is of silver, that the people of the United States want neither for actual use as currency, for manual delivery in any of the processes of trade which require the use of money. I have before me the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury showing that $120,486,817 of gold certificates are outstanding, and $145,543,150 of silver certificates are outstanding. The excess of silver certificates is not great. This statement shows that the people of the United States do not want coin as a circulating medium, that for the purposes for which they use money they want paper. Whether it be the actual representative of coin or not, at all events it is to be paper. As applied to the uses made of gold and silver certificates, it is plain that the people of the United States do not want either gold or silver, but they want the paper representative of both, and in about equal amounts.

The Senator from New Jersey, repeating what he has said so often before, is fearful, and the Senator from Ohio the same way is fearful, that the more extended use of silver will operate to drive out gold. I well remember the debate which occurred on that proposition, as on all cognate ones, in 1878, when what is known as the silver bill was passed. Two months before the passage of the silver bill the total amount of gold coin in the United States was $167,501,472—$167,501,472 was the total amount of gold coin and bullion in the United States two months prior to the passage of that act. On the last day of January, 1887, the total amount in the United States of gold coin and bullion was $654,520,335, nearly four times the amount of gold coin and bullion in the United States after nine years of operation under the silver bill, and after the coinage meanwhile of 277,445,767 silver dollars. The gold coin and bullion in the United States had multiplied four times, and I am told that the last report of the Director of the Mint shows that the importation of gold into the United States during the last calendar year is two and a-half times greater than it was the preceding calendar year.

Whoever has the curiosity to observe the table which accompanies the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury will find that this is not spasmodic, but that in every single year since the passage of the silver bill the amount of gold coin and bullion in the United States has appreciably increased. The increase has not been regular, but it has been constant. The very first year after the passage of the bill the amount of gold coin had gone up from $167,000,000 to $213,000,000. The next year it went to $245,000,000; the next year to $351,000,000, an increase of a little over $100,000,000; the next year it went to $478,000,000; the next year to $506,000,000; the next year to $542,000,000; the next year to $545,000,000, and that was the smallest increase in any one year, being a little over $3,000,000; the next year it went to $588,000,000; the next year to $590,000,000, and the next year to $654,000,000.

So, if we are to be guided in our opinion as to what would be the result of the passage of this amendment, judging by what has been heretofore, we are bound to presume that not only will this addition to the silver certificates of the country not result in driving out gold, but it will result in a further enhancement of the stock of gold in our possession.

Mr. BUTLER. And the increased importation of gold.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, and the increased importation of gold. In any view that can be taken of this measure, the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is the most important part of it. No Senator on this floor has risen in his place to say that the President is not now amply authorized by law to do exactly what he could do if the bill had been passed as it came from the Finance Committee. That being the case, we are doing nothing by that bill but removing the slight doubt which the President of the United States seemed to have in regard to his authority under existing law.

Meanwhile the Senator from New Jersey himself enforces the necessity for this amendment by the suggestion that the national-bank circulation will be reduced during the coming year $85,000,000. He looks upon that with complacency, as do all those who stand for his school of finance. He regards that undoubtedly as desirable. He is here not only to assert that it is liable to happen, but he is here to assert that he will oppose to the bitterest anything designed to prevent it or to qualify it. No more significant utterance has been made than that we are in the face of a declining national-bank circulation to the amount of $85,000,000 during the coming year, and we are still bidden not to do anything to prevent it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. PLUMB. I will.

Mr. McPHERSON. Instead of increasing the coinage of the standard silver dollar and in that way, as I think, threatening and endangering the parity between the gold and silver coin which it is so necessary to maintain, would it not be better to release one or both of the two special funds now held in the Treasury, to wit, first, the one held in the Treasury in the shape of Treasury notes to redeem national-bank circulation, having a bill before us for that purpose, and, if you please to do it, substituting for the other special fund of $100,000,000 held in the Treasury the same bonds so purchased and release that fund? There are $170,000,000 in the Treasury which under the bills now pending before the Senate, other than this one, might easily be released, and in this way whatever deficiency in circulation there was by reason of the surrender could be made up from that source.

While I am on my feet, will the Senator let me go a step further and answer the criticism that he has made upon myself and others who did not believe with him in 1878 that it was unwise to resume the coinage of the silver dollar at that time? It will be remembered it was a period in the history of this country when other great nations were surrendering silver coinage. At that time I thought (perhaps I do not think so now to the same extent) that it would be better not, at that particular time, to resume the coinage of the silver dollar.

But the Senator will remember that the coinage of the silver dollar has been very limited. I say very limited. I speak in a comparative sense. We have coined but $2,000,000 of silver a month. The Government of the United States under the operation of the law has made it necessary for the Treasury to redeem the silver certificates every day. They are paid into the custom-house in New York, they come to the custom-house in the payment of dues, and come to the Treasury of the United States, the Treasury thus practically redeeming them. In short, all kinds of machinery have been set in motion through the operation of the law to keep the silver dollar up to par and to keep it in circulation.

The Senator will further observe that during this period of time, when we have been coining $2,000,000 per month, there has been a reduction of $150,000,000 of the national-bank circulation. All these agencies have been at work to assist the forced circulation of silver, the national banks surrendering and the Government, as I say, redeeming its silver certificates every day. But let the Senator remember that the Government never undertakes to redeem its coin. That is what you propose to do under the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky. It is to convert the silver bullion that you purchase under this proposed act into standard silver dollars.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question.

Mr. McPHERSON. In one moment; as soon as I get through with my statement.

I look upon this course as being far worse for the Government in the effort to maintain the parity of these two coins than it would have been to have simply left it in the form of bullion, to be from time to time converted, of course, into standard silver dollars as occasion might require and as it might be absorbed in the circulation. Certainly we could have issued certificates which would have gone into circulation for the purchase of the bullion, but when there are so many different methods by which funds are to-day tied up in the Treasury which might very easily be released without in any manner or shape changing the financial condition of the Government or its policy, I think it would be far better to do that than to adopt a policy here which no man can tell how far-reaching it will be in its results.

The corrected statement that I make now, having been misled on yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky, is that instead of $85,000,000 there are but $69,000,000 of the 4½ per cent. bonds held by the national banks as a basis for the circulation of their notes. Suppose that is all displaced within a single year, because, as I said before, those bonds having the shortest time to run and paying least premium will probably first be offered for sale and first purchased. The result of it will be that $69,000,000 of silver coin must be added, if you please, the first year in addition to that now coined under existing law and made necessary by the act of 1878. Sixty-nine million dollars of new silver coin would be thrown into the Treasury or into circulation, when to-day it is almost impossible to absorb the amount of silver we have now, and there is a large amount of it in the Treasury difficult to get into circulation.

Mr. TELLER. I wanted to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he meant to state whether the Treasury Department were troubled with the amount of silver received for import duties, etc.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Not at all; but I wish to say to the Senator from Colorado that when the Congress of the United States made it necessary to receive silver certificates in payment of import dues those silver certificates were paid in by the merchants of New York, and they came back here to the Treasury the very next day.

Mr. TELLER. Are they not receivable for import duties now?

Mr. MCPHERSON. They are received now, but owing to the policy the Treasury has pursued, owing to the policy that the people of this country supposed we would continue to pursue, which was that there would be no increase of the limit of the coinage of the standard silver dollar, confidence has been restored, and merchants and bankers have parted with their gold as freely as their silver.

I have not taken the estimate since that time, but on the 8th day of March 77 per cent. of the payments into the Treasury for customs duties for the ten days preceding that date was paid in those certificates. The silver certificates being of smaller denominations, and required as a matter of course in the transaction of business, and being more convenient, were preferred by the banks for their customers. Hence it was that the gold came into the Treasury for the payment of duties; but if any other conditions had existed, if the confidence that the public has in the continued operations of the Treasury should have ceased, that very moment we would have had payments made in silver instead of gold.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it is very easy for the Senator from New Jersey to suggest some better plan of arriving at the result which I, in common with a majority of the Senate, have in view. Unfortunately, however, the Senator from New Jersey has never had the honor to propose anything here which was in that direction. For him to suggest now that something better might be done is simply to suggest a further postponement and to make it absolutely certain that nothing will be done in the presence of the great emergency which now exists. I agree with him, if I understand him aright to say that the hundred million dollars held in the Treasury for the redemption of the legal-tender notes ought to be paid out, and I am willing that the great bulk of them should be paid out without leaving bonds in their place to be sold in the case of an emergency which, as I believe, will never arise.

For the purpose of testing the Senator on that point, which may become important within a few days, I will ask him if he will vote to put out the hundred million dollars of gold in the Treasury, substituting for it bonds which may be sold at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury if it should become necessary to raise a fund to meet greenbacks to be presented?

Mr. MCPHERSON. The Senator from Kansas evidently wants an answer. I am not in the habit of making a jump before I reach the stile. When that matter comes before the Senate I will take it into careful consideration, provided, however, that the Senator does not supply all needed deficiencies which he thinks are now confronting us or which may hereafter confront us by the process that he now has before the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. It is apparent, then, that this suggestion of other things which might be done was made for one sole purpose, and that only to defeat this proposition.

It is a little bit singular, if there is such great danger in the issue of silver certificates, and if they are for all practical purposes worth so much less, that they are not used for the payment of customs dues in New York. Why does not the New York importer, who is generally credited with being pretty smart, take the cheaper money to pay his customs dues with? Why does he pay 77 per cent. of all the dues upon the goods which he has imported, in gold certificates and not in silver certificates?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will answer the Senator. It is because there is no cheaper money. All the money of this Government stands equal, owing entirely to the operations of the Treasury in maintaining the parity between the two metals. If the Senator from Kansas should go to the Treasury as a creditor of the Government and demand gold for his bill, the Treasury would give it to him. He may exercise his option. If the Senator from Ohio should go and demand silver, the Treasury would give it to him. Just so long as the Treasury is able to pay every creditor of the Government in just such money as he wants, just so long can there be no cheap money in this country.

While I am on my feet I will be more frank and fair with the Senator from Kansas in answer to his questions. I will answer his first question by saying that I intend to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Ohio to release this fund of $70,000,000 held for the redemption of national-bank notes. I will go further. If no legislation of this character is made, I will agree to deposit the bonds so purchased with that money and to put them into the Treasury as a substitution for the hundred million dollars, and let that fund become a surplus also to be used in the purchase of bonds.

The Senator thinks I am unwilling to do anything in the world that will prevent the contraction of the currency. I am willing to release this $170,000,000 of money, if needed, and give it to the country for their purposes, to be used in the transaction of business; but I am not in favor of this silver coinage which the Senator advocates.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator is nearly as good a convert as Paul. He admits that there ought to be $170,000,000, or more, of additional money in circulation in the country. He admits that we ought to take out the $100,000,000 of gold held for the redemption of greenbacks and the $70,000,000 of money held for the redemption of national-bank notes, and put them in circulation. That is confession enough as the foundation, if the Senator from New Jersey may be regarded as authority, for a great deal more than I propose.

But I want something that can be had. I want something that is within sight. I want something that does not depend upon the chances of a bill running the rapids of the House of Representatives at this session of Congress. Here is something conservative, simply providing that whatever the volume of paper money outstanding now, it shall be maintained at, following precisely the example set in 1878, when we enacted that the greenbacks which were paid at the Treasury should be again paid out, and that the volume should not be diminished.

I believe that we should not only have legislation of this kind, but I believe that all the money in the Treasury which is not needed for current purposes, and which may not be needed for the redemption of the greenbacks, ought to be put into circulation. I believe that thereby the interests of the people of the United States would be greatly enhanced. I believe it would enhance the value of property. I believe it would quicken business in every part of the Republic. I believe it would give employment where now there is none, and life where there is stagnation. This does not represent anything like what I believe ought to be done, but I have chosen to propose and support that which is so conservative that I did not believe it would receive the opposition of any conscientious man, simply to arrest the contraction that is going on from day to day until we could, under the lead of the Finance Committee, or otherwise, devise some means whereby the currency should be increased in accordance with the increasing needs of the people.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7217) for the erection of a public building at Lowell, Mass., and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 4, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 3, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN, D. D.

On motion of Mr. LONG, by unanimous consent, the reading of so much of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday as related to the introduction of bills and resolutions was dispensed with. The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of War of deficiencies in the appropriation for contingent expenses of the War Department for the fiscal year 1888; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a revised estimate of an appropriation for the revenue-cutter service for the fiscal year 1889; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL DEPOSITORIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying schedules, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information relative to national banks designated as national depositories; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATION AS TO TIMBER LANDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, the report of Special Agent Bowers relative to desirable legislation for the public timber lands; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LIENS UPON OLD POST-OFFICE PROPERTY, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General in relation to certain liens upon the old post-office property, New York, for the payment of which an appropriation has been heretofore recommended; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 2927) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., with Senate amendments thereto.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, the Senate requests a conference on that bill. Without having the Senate amendments reported, I ask unanimous consent that the House disagree to them and agree to a conference.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the managers on the part of the House during the day.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION, PARIS, 1889.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution (H. Res. 83) accepting the invitation of the French Republic to take part in an international exposition to be held in Paris in 1889, with amendments of the Senate thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the amendments ordered to be printed.

STEPHEN M. HONEYCUTT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 481) for the relief of Stephen M. Honeycutt, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina, the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

LOUIS JACOBSON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 1158) for the relief of Louis Jacobson, with an amendment of the Senate thereto.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the conference requested.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have the amendment reported?

Mr. LANHAM. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] asks unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate and agree to a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment will be reported.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I can state very briefly what the amendment is, and thus save time.

This was a private bill for the relief of a postmaster in California in connection with certain postal funds which were lost. It was reported from the committee to the House and it went to the Senate. The Senate amended the bill by putting on an amendment to the general statute, authorizing the Postmaster-General to investigate such claims for losses by postmasters. Now, inasmuch as that partakes of the nature of general legislation which relates to the postal department, I ask that one of the conferees on the part of the House may be the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

The SPEAKER. The first question is, is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that the House non-concur and agree to a conference?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the conferees on the part of the House during the day.

Mr. DUNN. What is that bill, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It is a private bill for the relief of a postmaster, to which the Senate has added an amendment affecting the general law in relation to such claims.

REFORM SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 1361) to incorporate the Reform School for Girls in the District of Columbia, with Senate amendments thereto; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LOUIS JACOBSON.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, has that bill for the relief of a postmaster been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendment has been non-concurred in, and the request of the Senate for a conference agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I was not present when that was done, and of course I can get no advantage from any objection at this time; but that is a private bill on which an amendment to the general law was ingrafted by the Senate. The result of that kind of legislation will be to take all postal legislation from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and attach it to private bills, and I therefore give notice that hereafter I shall object to all such legislation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] as one of the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. LANHAM. I requested that the gentleman from Georgia should be appointed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] made that request.

Mr. DOCKERY. That does not relieve the case from its objectionable features.

RECORD OF WILLS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1514) relating to the record of wills in the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DULUTH, RAINY LAKE RIVER, ETC., RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1584) granting the right of way to the Duluth, Rainy Lake River and Southwestern Railway Company through certain Indian lands in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked for.

Mr. DUNHAM. Can we have the amendments read?

Mr. CULBERSON. If there is to be any discussion I shall have to object to the request.

Mr. PEEL. I hope the objection will be withdrawn, as I understand that these amendments are immaterial.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the gentleman from Texas objects on account of my asking to have the amendments read, I withdraw the request.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not object to the request to non-concur.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

CAPT. JOHN BURKHART.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2112) for the relief of Capt. John Burkhart.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendments of the Senate to this bill simply reduce the amount the soldier will receive; and as it is perhaps the best he can obtain, I ask to concur in them.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

THOMAS A. OSBORN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Osborn," in line 8, down to the end of the bill, as follows:

"Provided, It shall be proven to the satisfaction of the Secretary that said money was lost without fault or negligence upon part of said Osborn."

Mr. HOLMAN. We can not agree to that request.

Mr. SPRINGER. This had better go to the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I ask unanimous consent to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked for.

Mr. SPRINGER. To agree to this amendment would take away all the safeguards thrown around the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. This bill was reported by the gentleman from Kentucky. The committee report that they found this loss was without fault on the part of the claimant, and the amendment was made to the bill which the Senate thought entirely unnecessary, as it only made additional work for the Secretary without necessity.

Mr. WARNER. We reported it from our committee last year favorably.

Mr. TAULBEE. Let the bill be read and then I shall renew the request for concurrence.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. TAULBEE. I now renew the request to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we had better non-concur and let it go to conference.

Mr. RYAN. Very well; let that course be taken.

Mr. MORRILL. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

There being no objection, the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in.

BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to bills of the House; which were referred as follows, namely:

The bill (H. R. 2805) granting a pension to Martha T. Woodrum, widow of James Woodrum, deceased—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions;

The bill (H. R. 6899) to incorporate the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company of the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia; and

The bill (H. R. 7263) for the erection of a public building at Bay City, Mich.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will lay before the House, without causing their titles to be severally read, a number of Senate bills and have them entered upon the Journal and appropriately referred.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The list of bills and their reference is as follows:

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the request of the Senate for the return of the bill (S. 758) for the relief of purchasers and other grantees of the United States of certain swamp and overflowed lands, and to reimburse and indemnify certain States.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this request will be complied with, and the bill will be returned to the Senate.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BLAND, to attend the funeral of a relative in Missouri.

PRINTING TARIFF BILL.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 3,000 additional copies of the tariff bill be ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I hope the number will be increased, as it will only give to each member some eight or nine copies, being totally inadequate.

Mr. McMILLIN. I did not feel justified in making a request for a larger number. What number would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Say 5,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There ought to be at least 6,000.

Mr. DORSEY. I move to make it 10,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to state that this is the usual number under such circumstances, and it can be increased by a joint resolution at any time hereafter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to make the number 6,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will modify the request, and ask that 5,000 copies be printed. I make the request this morning in order to prevent the necessity for a reprint, as the printing of the bill has not yet been done.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KILGORE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1678) to authorize the purchase of a site for a public building at Buffalo, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 3191) granting a pension to Mary S. Logan; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 77) to supply the Department of State with copies of bills and other documents.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was given to Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, until the 15th of April, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up the special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The gentleman from Texas antagonizes that by calling up the special order. But under the resolution adopted yesterday the question must first be upon the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SPRINGER. What appropriation bill does the gentleman desire to have up?

Mr. FORAN. The pension appropriation bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would like to hear the resolution read.

Mr. RANDALL. I assure the gentleman from Texas that appropriation bills by the express terms of the order have preference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that portion of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

That none of the foregoing assignments of days shall interfere with the consideration of revenue or general appropriation bills, but the order assigning a day to the Committee on Agriculture shall be a continuing one until two days have been occupied in the consideration of bills reported by it, and on any of the days hereinbefore designated, immediately after the reading of the Journal, a motion shall be in order that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue or general appropriation bills.

Mr. REED. Let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. If the House should resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House, would that antagonize and dispense with the special order made yesterday for the Judiciary Committee for the consideration of the direct-tax bill?

The SPEAKER. It would, during the time the House is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON. Then if we do not desire to set that aside we shall vote against the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The question being taken on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. FORAN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 81.

Mr. FORAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered—46 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 95, nays 144, not voting 85; as follows:

So the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was not agreed to.

Mr. RYAN. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his seat when his name was called?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I was, but did not respond.

The SPEAKER. The practice is, if a gentleman was in his seat or in the Hall when his name was called and failed to hear it, then he is allowed to vote.

Mr. CANNON. I challenge the vote of the gentleman from Mississippi, for the reason that he said he heard his name called but did not vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair in the confusion failed to hear the explanation of the gentleman from Mississippi. He will please repeat it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. I heard my name called and before I had time to vote the Clerk had passed on to the next name. I vote "ay."

Mr. TAULBEE. I submit this question to the Chair. Is it not as competent for a member to vote after having heard his name called and failing to respond as it is to change his vote after the completion of the roll-call?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. TAULBEE. Suppose a member does not desire to vote on the roll-call and afterwards changes his mind?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that under those circumstances he has no right to vote. If a member sits in his seat and purposely refrains from voting when his name is called, he has no right to vote. The practice which has grown up in the House has been adopted in order that gentlemen may not be deprived of the right to vote who by reason of the confusion did not hear their names called.

The names of members voting were then read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 3, 1888.

Ordered, That the Senate be directed to withdraw the request for the return of the bill of the Senate No. 758, for the relief of purchasers and other grantees of the United States of certain swamp and overflowed lands, and to reimburse and indemnify certain States.

The SPEAKER. This morning, in obedience to a request of the Senate, an order was made to return the bill named to that body. As the request is now withdrawn, if there be no objection the order will be set aside.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. I desire to ask what has been done with the Senate bill in relation to swamp and overflowed lands?

The SPEAKER. The Senate requested the House to return the bill, and that request was granted this morning. The request is now withdrawn, and unanimous consent has been given to set aside the order returning the bill to the Senate, so that the bill remains in the House.

Mr. PAYSON. And it will go to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. It will go there. The Chair will refer the bill properly.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. WHEELER rose.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. REED to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and the Speaker declared that it was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I called for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] rose and the Chair recognized him, but he made no motion, so the Chair announced the result.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, a page stood right in front of the gentleman from Alabama, and may have prevented his request reaching the Chair, but he made it distinctly.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Alabama was not too late, I saw him rise and make the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair accepts the statement of course, but the Chair did not hear the gentleman.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. REED to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and there were—ayes 71, noes 24.

Mr. WHEELER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED and Mr. BURROWS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 157, nays 74, not voting 93; as follows:

OFFICIAL FORCE, PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. HUDD. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUDD. A bill introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] to amend sections 476 and 477 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the Patent Office, was referred to the Committee on Patents. As that bill provided for increase of salary in the Interior Department, it should have gone to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department. I ask that the reference be changed.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will furnish to the Chair a memorandum of the number and title of the bill, the Chair will examine the question. The correction of an erroneous reference of a public bill is a matter of privilege.

Mr. WEAVER. I think the bill ought to go to the committee indicated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HUDD].

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the question.

REFUND OF DIRECT TAX OF 1861.

Mr. CULBERSON. I now call up the special order, the bill (S. 139) to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. This bill will have to be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair discovers that the bill is on the Calendar of that committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HATCH in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill 139.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to each State and Territory of the United States and the District of Columbia a sum equal to all collections made from said States and Territories and the District of Columbia, or from any of the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or other persons, under the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, and the amendatory acts thereto.

SEC. 2. That all moneys still due to the United States on the quota of direct tax apportioned by section 8 of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861, are hereby remitted and relinquished.

SEC. 3. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to reimburse each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia for all money found due to them under the provisions of this act; and the Treasurer of the United States is hereby directed to pay the same to the governors of the States and Territories and to the commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, That where the sums, or any part thereof, credited to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, have been collected by the United States from the citizens or inhabitants thereof, or any other person, either directly or by sale of property, such sums shall be held in trust by such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for the benefit of those persons or inhabitants from whom they were collected, or their legal representatives: And provided further, That no part of the money collected from individuals and to be held in trust as aforesaid shall be retained by the United States as a set-off against any indebtedness alleged to exist against the State, Territory, or District of Columbia in which such tax was collected: And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid out by the governor of any State or Territory, or any other person, to any attorney or agent under any contract for services now existing or heretofore made between the representative of any State or Territory and any attorney or agent. All claims under the trust hereby created shall be filed with the governor of such State or Territory and the commissioners of the District of Columbia, respectively, within six years next after the passage of this act, and all claims not so filed shall be forever barred, and the money attributable thereto shall belong to such State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, respectively, as the case may be.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary were read, as follows:

After the word "collections," in line 5 of section 1, insert "by set-off or otherwise;" so as to read, "a sum equal to all collections by set-off or otherwise."

In the third section of the bill strike out the last proviso, beginning after the word "collected," in line 20.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, as this bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR], I yield the floor to him for the management of the measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] is recognized as entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, while this bill is important on account of the amount of money involved, the facts connected with the bill are so simple and few that it seems to me but little time need be occupied in its discussion. However, as there are strenuous objections urged to the bill on the part of some members, I desire to be as liberal as possible under the circumstances in allowing those gentlemen to be heard in presenting their objections.

Two amendments have been presented by the committee and are pending. The first is to amend the first section by adding, after the word "collections," in the third line, the words "by set-off or otherwise."

This amendment is in pursuance of a suggestion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to secure the repayment of any set-off credit to any State on account of direct tax, and to that extent possibly enlarges the word "collection."

The bill as it passed the Senate provides that no payment should be made of this money or any part of it by the governors of any of the States to agents under any contracts that had existed theretofore.

An amendment is suggested striking out that provision on this ground only, and it is for the House to say whether it should be done. It did not seem to us wise that the Government should compel in this form the State authorities to repudiate their own contracts, but if anything should be done let the States take the responsibility in that regard.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the summer of 1861, after the organization of the rebellion, and while things were in a state of uncertainty and the revenues of the country unequal to the demand then existing, a bill was passed by Congress and became a law, by which $20,000,000 were levied and apportioned amongst the people of the States. Subsequent to that enactment the machinery necessary to carry out that levy and secure the collection of that sum was enacted by Congress, part of it as late as the year 1862. Circumstances quickly arose which interfered with the collection of that tax in some of the States of the Union, and it was only in some parts of the Union partially collected. For the most part in amount, and perhaps in numbers, the State authorities, the Legislature, assumed to pay and did pay the General Government the whole amount apportioned among the people of that State, with the exception of the 15 per cent. offered to them, perhaps as an inducement to make that assumption of the tax.

It will be noticed this bill provides only for the repayment of the amount collected and does not include this 15 per cent. The amount of the debt which has been collected in one way and another is something over $15,000,000. The amount that remains uncollected altogether is $2,600,000. The credit to States which assumed the payment of the tax amounts to $2,227,000.

This proposition relinquishes the amount uncollected to surrender that claim, and provides for the repayment to States and individuals as far as may be who have paid any of this money. It is simply that and nothing more. The reason for it is this: The collection of this tax as to the States where the payment has not yet been made has been long ago abandoned, except the United States authorities have insisted until recently upon offsetting claims due from the United States Government to the various States without giving them credit on this tax. That has been resisted from time to time, and claims have been before Congress, even the present Congress, in favor of many States justly due, honestly due, and fully due; but they have been resisted by Congress because of the existence of this tax, which has been unpaid. There has been, under some sort of compulsion, many of these set-offs paid in the adjustment of accounts between the Government and the States, but the Supreme Court has decided that can not be done except in the cases where the debt has been assumed. By surrender to apportion under the Constitution it is not a State indebtedness, but an individual indebtedness, to be collected out of the private property of individuals of a State and all of them.

Now, it stands in this way. There is no way of collecting this debt without credits to be given where claims are presented and acknowledged to be just in favor of the States. It must either remain as it is, a portion of the States and individuals having paid their full proportion of this tax, and others having paid it partially, but not in full, and others not having paid any, or else the machinery still existing by law and still practicable and feasible must be carried on and this tax collected from the States where it has not been paid yet, or the plan adopted in this bill must be enforced, and that is to relinquish the claim so far as unpaid and to pay it back so far as it has been paid.

There is, Mr. Chairman, one inequality in this idea that the States which assumed this debt in 1862 in many cases borrowed the money, and in many instances are paying interest on it to this day, while in other cases they have been lying out of the use of their money from 1861 or 1862 until this time.

The amount has been doubled over and over again by reason of the accumulation of interest, and yet there is no expectation or purpose in this bill to have paid back anything but the simple amount of the first payment, even deducting the percentage for the cost of collection. There will be no equality in the cases then, but it will approach it far more nearly than it exists now, one State having paid its full share, another State paying only a part, and another paying none. Still there will be a settlement of the controversy, and it is believed that this affords the best and the only basis that can be attained. There are other difficulties that have arisen in connection with the matter. The State of Georgia has, for instance, pro forma assumed the indebtedness. Her Legislature has agreed to assume the indebtedness and pay the money. But she refuses to do it because now it is alleged that there was no authority on the part of the Legislature to pass the enactment. There is one of the troubles that arises. In the State of South Carolina perhaps the whole amount has been paid. It was not assumed by the State, but it was paid by the people of the State.

And right in this connection some of the gravest hardships that I know of growing out of the war exist. The town of Beaufort was taken and sold, and the adjoining lands in that immediate vicinity, bringing but a small amount at a forced sale under such circumstances. But the tax at all events of that State has been paid substantially.

These matters are all unadjusted; they are all at loose ends. There must be some system providing some way of adjusting the difficulty, and what plan more just and equitable can be devised than to relinquish the tax where it has not been paid, and pay it back without interest where it has been paid?

Mr. Chairman, this tax was not levied by a part of the country for the benefit of a part of the country. It was levied by the Congress of the United States under the Constitution of the United States that extends over all its territory. It applied to all its people legally, morally, rightfully, as much in one section as in the other. It was for the benefit of the whole people, as much those residing in one part of the country as in any other part. That is recognized now. It is understood that we are all together again; not reluctantly, but cheerfully, all of us accepting the situation and rejoicing in the present condition of things. This tax was seemingly essential. It was levied for the purpose of protecting the integrity of the Union. It was levied by competent authority. It was levied for an important purpose. It should be paid or it should be adjusted. I do not intend personally to take but little time in the discussion of this matter, and for the present I reserve the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty-five minutes of his time remaining, having consumed but fifteen minutes.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I reserve that.

[Mr. OATES withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, owing to the fact that only on yesterday was the pending bill set for discussion to-day, and therefore that it has been impossible for me to thoroughly arrange for presentation the views I now wish to submit thereupon, I ask the indulgence of the House if I find myself obliged to rely more or less on the manuscript material before me. I desire also to ask, in this connection, that in preparing my remarks for publication in the RECORD I may be permitted to incorporate therein some tables bearing upon the question at issue which I will not consume the time of the House now by reading in full, but merely allude to in passing.

In attempting, Mr. Chairman, to answer the argument of my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES], for whose ability I have great respect, and whose frankness and honesty of expression always challenge my admiration, I shall not undertake to discuss all the points referred to by him as bearing collaterally upon the subject under consideration, and many of which, I think, should have no weight with us in determining our judgment as to the merits of the pending bill. The question of the distribution of the surplus then in the Treasury under the act of 1836, and that of refunding the "cotton tax," while always interesting to consider, can not, I think, justly be claimed to have any place in this discussion; and I shall therefore decline for the present to give to their consideration more than a passing notice while I invite the attention of the House to what I conceive to be the broad principle of common justice underlying the proposition contained in the measure before us, and give some reasons why I believe it should receive the cordial approval of Congress.

If this were a question, Mr. Chairman, of whether or not the Federal Government should now enforce the payment of the tax levied upon and yet unpaid by the States now in default, I should hesitate to record my vote in favor of such a proposition, and I would give good reasons why I should qualify my action in seeking justice for my own people so as to yet temper my demands with mercy for others. Missouri asks nothing of the people now in default which she is not willing to accord to the people of all the States of this Union. She is not here mendicant-like, hat in hand, asking for favors. She is not here a jobber asking for a divide in the result of the perpetration of a wrong on any section of this country. She is here as a State the people of which have complied with their just obligations as imposed by a law constitutionally enacted and binding upon all, and have complied with all its requirements as good citizens and put their money into the Treasury, which they now ask the consent of the people who have not so discharged their duty, to withdraw, not with accumulated interest for twenty-six years, for which she might in equity have permission to present a claim as against the delinquent States.

My distinguished friend from Alabama has collaterally discussed as pertinent to the consideration of the question at issue the attempt at distribution by the Federal Government in 1836, of the surplus then in the Treasury. Mr. Chairman, that is somewhat remote, it occurs to me, to be brought into the consideration of the question now at issue. But let me say to the gentleman from Alabama that when that question is presented as an issue on which the members of this House shall vote he will find me prepared to consider it, as I consider this, as a question of governmental policy, on which our conduct should be based on the eternal principle of justice to all the people, and prepared to vote in accordance with that line of policy which will, in my judgment, secure perfect justice to all concerned.

Alabama, he says, received some of that money; Minnesota and California none. Of course not. At that time they had not even the form of States. Alabama has received part; so she has; but has any one ever heard the voice of the member from Alabama or any of its citizens proposing to return that money to the Treasury for the common account and use? I apprehend not. Alabama, in that case, has received a part of what, under that law, if it were fully executed, she would be entitled to, as Alabama has in the case at bar received the benefit of her failure to meet the obligations imposed, as my friend concedes, under a proper application of the law-making powers of the Government exercised in consonance with the Constitution of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in whatever I may have to say about the good State of Alabama or any other State whose attitude with reference to this bill I am obliged to discuss in connection with this question, I beg to assure her members and this House that I have no desire to be offensive in any sense, and I shall use such illustrations only so far as I may feel to be absolutely necessary to a proper presentation of my views of the case.

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama has discussed at some length the cotton tax. I do not propose to be diverted from the discussion of this question by any consideration of the cotton tax. Nor shall I enter into a discussion of any of the points which have been presented by him touching that subject, as I feel that however cogent they may be, in the abstract, they have no proper relation to the subject now under discussion. But this I pledge him, that in the consideration of that question when he presents it, as he proposes to do, I will try to be as just in every act of mine in that regard as I ask him and his people now to be just to those whom I represent. He says that owing to the changes in population of the different States perfect justice can not be done under the provisions of this bill. I apprehend that under no law enacted by human wisdom, and under no law enforced by human agencies can perfect and exact justice be done. This is presented, however, as the closest possible approximation to justice which is to be attained by legislative effort in the direction of a settlement of this vexed question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg to present, in as good form as I have been able to prepare them, some reasons why this bill should become a law.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HEARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. Do you know how much your State would receive if the cotton tax were refunded?

Mr. HEARD. I have no idea, because I have not considered that question as pertinent to this, nor have I had any occasion to consider it as an independent matter.

Mr. OATES. If the cotton tax were refunded, the gentleman's State would receive $592,098.36.

Mr. HEARD. I am obliged to the gentleman from Alabama for the information, and, with him, I join in the statement that whatever interest my State may have in that matter, it shall not influence my action in regard to the consideration of the question when proposed. I know my friend means that, because if there is an honest man on this floor or on the earth it is my friend from Alabama; but I beg him to permit me to call his attention to the attitude in which his people stand with relation to the people of my State, and of others similarly situated, and who, like them, were at the time this tax was laid amenable to the provisions of the Constitution and to the laws enacted in pursuance thereof. I ask him to consider that, and when he asks generosity of treatment for his people to accord justice to mine.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will permit me, the cotton-tax amendment which I offered would not take away from his State any portion of the direct tax proposed to be refunded.

Mr. HEARD. I understand that.

Mr. OATES. It would only add that much to the amount.

Mr. HEARD. I perfectly understand that.

Mr. OATES. And my proposition is that, while I am opposed to the bill for the refunding of the direct tax, yet, if it is to be passed, I want to couple the other with it, so as to make the raid one that will be worth considering.

Mr. HEARD. I perfectly understand the gentleman's theory and purpose, and whether it be regarded by him as complimentary or not, I will say that if there is any subject which he is perfectly competent to consider in connection with this proposition, it is the question of a "raid," for I submit that his State, which was assessed for her share of this tax as the other States were assessed, in a manner which the gentleman concedes was in consonance with the Constitution, and which State, under the decision of the Supreme Court, does not stand to-day as having paid a dollar of it—I say the State of Alabama stands in the position of being willing to "raid" the people of Missouri, who paid their $646,000 of this tax when a dollar was as precious to her people as it has ever been to the people of Alabama. I say the people of my State paid all that money, it being withheld from them in settlement by the Government for moneys which the State had advanced and which she had otherwise a right to recover.

But, Mr. Chairman, Missouri is unlike Alabama. Alabama may now go into the Court of Claims under the "Louisiana decision" and recover from the Government every penny withheld from her allowances, although she has never paid a dollar of the direct tax which the gentleman admits was constitutionally levied.

Mr. OATES. I want to interrupt my friend just there, if he will permit it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. HEARD. I do, most cheerfully.

Mr. OATES. I know the gentleman does not intend to misrepresent at all.

Mr. HEARD. Indeed I do not, and I am glad to be corrected if I am wrong.

Mr. OATES. The assessment of a direct tax like this is never a debt of the State until the State assumes it.

Mr. HEARD. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. OATES. Therefore, when the gentleman speaks of it he should not speak of it as a debt of the State of Alabama, but as an assessment against the people of Alabama—against the land-owners of that State.

Mr. HEARD. I thank the gentleman for the distinction, and I shall try to bear it in mind in the course of this discussion. Technically, I lost sight of it for a moment in making the application; but in fact it amounts to the same thing, because every citizen of Alabama is interested in the enforcement or non-enforcement of this act. Every citizen of Alabama is interested likewise in the withholding by your State of what she should pay under this law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I proceed to present the reasons why I think this bill ought to pass.

This bill rests upon no issue or question of party politics. It is not in the interest of any section or class. It is an effort to equalize, as far as may be done, the inequalities, the hardships, and the injustice of the enforcement of the collection of the direct tax levied under the exigency which rested upon the General Government in 1861. The purposes of this bill have the indorsement and commendation of the present as well as of past administrations. No one favored it more earnestly than the lamented Secretary of the Treasury, the late Judge Folger, and the then First Comptroller. Of their published letters I shall again speak, but I desire now to invite your attention to the reasons for the legislation proposed by this bill.

Section 14 of the act to protect the revenue, etc., of July 28, 1866 (14 Stats., 331), suspended the further enforcement of the direct tax until January 1, 1868. And on July 23, 1868 (15 Stats., 260), this suspension was extended until January 1, 1869. In a special communication to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated May 3, 1880, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue forcibly pointed to the various inequalities which had arisen in the collection of the direct tax, and that large balances remained uncollected, and strenuously recommended that the collection of such balances be enforced, as such enforcement had been suspended merely until January 1, 1869, and that the period of legal suspension had expired.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue was in the position of an officer commanded to do a certain thing, and the act of suspension which saved him from dereliction for the non-enforcement of the act according to its express terms had expired. He rested, then, under the responsibility of enforcing the law, and as to the proper methods of enforcement he properly called upon Congress for direction.

Similar recommendations were made in the regular annual reports. The justice and fairness of collecting these balances was apparent, as is conceded by my friend from Alabama; for he makes no point on that. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the inadvisibility of enforcing the collection when the money was really no longer needed was manifest.

At this point I hope my friend from Alabama will give me his attention for a moment. He suggests that according to the changes of population, etc., incident to the development of this country, some inequalities must exist in the application of the provisions of this bill should it become a law. States of this Union are here to-day asking for the payment by the Government of moneys advanced as far back as 1777, and in the last two Congresses much time was consumed on this floor in discussing the question as to whether or not we would give to the State of Georgia exemption from the application of the practice which had obtained in the Treasury Department with reference to settlements affected by this law in relation to the $35,000 allowed to her by Congress on account of expenditures made in 1777. Talk about inequalities on account of the shifting of population! Where are the representatives of those people of Georgia who contributed the taxes to pay this money in 1777?

Mr. OATES. Does the gentleman contend that that is a parallel case with this? That was money paid by the State of Georgia to some merchants who furnished supplies to the army during the siege of Savannah.

Mr. HEARD. I understand that thoroughly; and I will say to the gentleman that $646,000, withheld from the State of Missouri under this law, was money contributed by the State for the use of the Government in purchasing supplies used in the late war.

Mr. OATES. But has not Congress always the constitutional power to expend money for the common defense? That power is very clear. But where does the gentleman find constitutional power to repay a tax lawfully laid and collected?

Mr. HEARD. Let me answer that question by asking another. Where, within the limits of the Constitution, for which the gentleman has such reverence, and whose precepts at least he so thoroughly honors by his concessions in this discussion—where in that instrument does the gentleman find authority to levy a tax upon more than thirty States of the Union, collect it rigorously in possibly twenty, and leave it untouched in the residue of the States?

Mr. OATES. That is not a constitutional question at all.

Mr. HEARD. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman may find it is a constitutional question. He admits that this tax was constitutionally laid. He admits that the Constitution requires that all taxes shall be uniformly laid; and if the great men who framed the Constitution had not embodied that principle in the express language of that instrument itself, the laws of justice would have caused every legislator to the end of time to respect it.

Mr. OATES. Was not the tax laid constitutionally? It is within the power of Congress to collect that tax now.

Mr. HEARD. I did not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. OATES. Was not this tax uniformly laid? My friend from Missouri certainly does not assert that it was not.

Mr. HEARD. I assert that it was uniformly laid; and I quote the gentleman from Alabama in support of the proposition.

Mr. OATES. Certainly; yet you maintain that it is not uniform because a part has not been collected.

Mr. HEARD. I assert, Mr. Chairman, most solemnly, and I challenge for the correctness of my position any common-sense criticism, that though a tax may be laid uniformly, yet when by the methods of collection you collect it only partially—that while in the framing of the act you observe the formal directions of the Constitution, you violate its spirit in the improper execution thereof.

Mr. OATES. Then, if I understand the gentleman's argument, he holds that this tax is unconstitutional simply because the Government has failed to collect some portion of it.

Mr. HEARD. Not by any means. On the contrary, I hold it is constitutional, and that as to the act of the Government which suspended the enforcement of the law, with all its hardships, those people who have been benefited by the extension of such clemency at the hands of the Government are, in God's name, the last that should ask to be heard in criticism of its conduct in such regard, or to assert that the States having already paid had forfeited any of their constitutional rights by reason of the delinquency of those still in default.

Mr. OATES. Is not that an argument altogether as to the policy of the measure, and not as to the question of power?

Mr. HEARD. Well, Mr. Chairman, the power the gentleman admits to be plenary.

Mr. OATES. The taxing power.

Mr. HEARD. The power to tax and to collect taxes.

Mr. OATES. Let me ask the gentleman one more question; I do not wish to interrupt him. Does he maintain that Congress can lay and collect taxes ad infinitum to refund taxes which have already been constitutionally laid and collected?

Mr. HEARD. Ah, Mr. Chairman, that is a different proposition.

Mr. OATES. That is what it results in.

Mr. HEARD. I say to the gentleman from Alabama that he well knows that to all intents and purposes, and necessarily in order to effectuate the ends of justice, the $646,000 collected by this tax from the State of Missouri, and which is authorized by this bill to be returned to her, must be considered as her money, although in the Treasury, until Alabama and other States in a like condition meet their obligations imposed by the provisions of the same law.

Mr. OATES. Does not the gentleman know it was expended, every dollar of it?

Mr. HEARD. No, I do not; and it is impossible for the gentleman from Alabama to know it.

Mr. OATES. Let me put it in this way. Suppose there was no money in the Treasury, would you agree to tax the people for the purpose of paying to the beneficiaries of this fund the sum of seventeen and a half millions of dollars?

Mr. HEARD. Yes, I would, unless I considered that equal justice to the States which had paid could better be secured by the enforcement of the law laying the tax. I do not intend to take refuge in any subterfuge from what I conceive to be a duty which I owe to the people of my State whose money the Government got. I do not intend to evade that duty simply because the enforcement or the carrying out of what is just to them, may be a scarecrow in some other quarters either as to matter or methods of taxation.

CONFEREES APPOINTED.

The committee informally rose, the Speaker taking the chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in accordance with the understanding this morning, will announce the conferees appointed on the part of the House on bills of the following titles.

On motion of Mr. BLANCHARD, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that in the number of copies of the river and harbor bill ordered to be reprinted this morning certain verbal corrections be made as he has indicated them.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. KENNEDY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 7217) for the erection of a public building at Lowell, Mass.; when the Speaker signed the same.

BILLS ORDERED TO BE REPRINTED.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that bills of the following titles be reprinted:

A bill (S. 249) to prevent the manufacture or sale of adulterated food or drugs in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (S. 116) to incorporate the American Trust Company for the District of Columbia.

FORFEITURE OF LAND GRANTS, NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MCRAE. I rise for the purpose of submitting a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on the Public Lands to report a bill (H. R. 9151) to forfeit lands granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and recommitted.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, without intending any discourtesy to my distinguished friend from Alabama, who has always been most courteous to me, or to other members upon the floor, I have to request that I may be permitted to pursue the line of remarks that I have mapped out for myself in part, and will then take much pleasure in answering, if I can, any inquiry which may be addressed to me in connection with the views I may have presented.

I resume now the reference I had already made, when interrupted, to the claims arising in some of the States on account of the war, and operations growing out of its prosecution. There were, as I have said, balances arising from the source I have mentioned and still unliquidated. But these uncollected balances for direct taxes had some years previously been charged up on the books of the Treasury as debts against the States respectively in their corporate and sovereign capacity. Many of the States had large claims against the Government for allowances for war material—that was the case with my own State—and as these claims were audited they were credited as against these direct-tax balances. Every dollar of assessment against my own State—$646,000 and more—was withheld on the settlement by the Government. Many States, regardless of the sides which they took in the late war, were entitled to sums of money on account of the 5 per cent. fund from sales of public lands and for swamp-land indemnities. Others had demands against the General Government for advances in the two wars with Great Britain and in various Indian wars, and as these demands were allowed by Congress, they have been similarly credited.

In short, all debts due by the General Government to any of the States on any account were, as soon as allowed, credited on these direct-tax balances as if they were debts against those States in their sovereign capacity, and this whether the States had assumed the payment of the direct tax or not.

The friction of these unadjusted and disputed accounts between the General Government and the States of the Union has been unremitting, and has been expensive, besides the constant irritation it has produced.

The Departments have been besieged ever since the ruling of First Comptroller Tayler that these balances were to be charged to the States, to have special allowances to the States exempted from the application of the rule. Applications have been made to the courts for mandamus on the First Comptroller and refused, because, however illegal the ruling of the official, his successor was prohibited by statute from reviewing it; and the court could not compel him by mandamus to do so.

Congress has been urged to adopt legislation to avoid the effect of this ruling as to credits. In one act to refund certain expenses to Georgia language was adopted providing that it should be paid in money. During the Forty-ninth Congress one of the first bills reported by the Judiciary Committtee was that a sum appropriated to Georgia should be paid instead of being credited. During its present term the Supreme Court, in the case of Louisiana vs. United States (123 U. S.), has expressly decided that this direct tax was not a debt of the States, and that sums due by the United States to the States on any account can not be set off against them, and that the Court of Claims can render judgment for all such sums, whether already credited or not. Under this decision Louisiana has recovered seventy-odd thousand dollars of the amount credited on the balance charged up against her, a very considerable part of said sum having been collected directly from her people.

That money so held by the Government as against the State of Louisiana was on account of what is known as the 5 per cent. fund, growing out of the donation of 5 per cent. of the sales of public land and from swamp-land indemnities. That money so held by the Government the court has decided was held as a trust fund, to be expended by the State in the proper execution of that trust. Now is not every citizen of that State interested in the return to that State of this $70,000, which goes into the common public fund of the State for the purposes specified in the trust? The funds withheld from Missouri are for moneys paid by her on account of war expenses. We can not recover in the Court of Claims or any other tribunal what has thus been withheld from us, while Louisiana and States similarly situated are allowed to recover the fund which had been held against them for the payment of this same debt.

Under the same ruling the State of Mississippi has recovered the sum of $41,453.91, which was the only payment or credit on account of the assessment against that State of $413,084.67. Under this same ruling the State of Alabama has recovered the sum of $18,285.03, which was the only payment or credit on account of the assessment against that State of $529,313.33. And there can be no doubt that Georgia can, at any time within six years from March 3, 1883, go into the Court of Claims and recover the sum of $35,555.42, allowed by Congress for "money expended in local defense of the common cause of independence in 1777."

And then neither Mississippi, Alabama, nor Georgia will have paid one cent on account of the direct tax of $20,000,000, whereof seven-eighths has been paid by other States and Territories of the Union.

Then, Mr. Chairman, when these States shall have pursued their remedies under the law as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, when they shall have, as Louisiana has done, enforced their demand recognized in that decision of the Supreme Court, they will not have paid a dollar into the Treasury in settlement of this tax which has been paid in full by my own State and by other States in response to an obligation of duty imposed upon all the States equally by the law.

This is one of the glaring inequalities of the situation which this bill is intended to remedy; but to remedy, not by enforcing unnecessarily upon Alabama, Mississippi, and Georgia the burden which the others have borne, but simply by returning to the other States the sums which they have paid, and releasing the delinquent States from their liability on account of this tax.

But there are other inequalities besides these, though not so great. These three States, and I refer to them simply for purposes of illustration, have practically paid nothing, but other States still owe balances.

The States of Colorado and Wisconsin, and the Territories of Washington and Utah each still owe small balances. I speak by the Treasury report of March 22, 1886.

The original direct-tax act, levying a tax of twenty millions annually, was passed on August 5, 1861. Said tax was apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, and has been adjudged by the Supreme Court to have been constitutional (O'Connor vs. Cooley, 12 Wall., 391; Detriville vs. Smalls, 98 United States, 517); but that tribunal has vacated proceedings under it for illegality in the manner of enforcing it. (Bennett vs. Hunter, 9 Wall., and Lee vs. United States.)

Even if I had not the high authority of my distinguished friend from Alabama to quote, I doubt if any man with the plain language of the Constitution before him could question the constitutionality of the law. The Supreme Court of the United States, however, has forever settled that question beyond all cavil, and placed it beyond the reach of controversy.

This act was passed under the pressing exigency of raising money to carry on the war. It was an expensive, undesirable, and cumbersome mode of taxation, and was really in the nature of an enforced loan to bridge over the pressing demands of the moment. It was discontinued after the first year. But on June 7, 1862, a special act was passed for enforcing the quotas of the first year against the States in insurrection. The Supreme Court has decided that these acts are to be construed as in pari materia, and as parts of a system. (Taylor vs. United States, 104; United States vs. Lawton, 110 U. S.)

Section 35 of the act of 1861 gave the States the option, respectively, of assuming the quota of the people of that State, and as an inducement to do so and secure the early use of the money, a deduction (15 per cent. if paid by June 30 and 10 per cent. if by September 30) is provided to be allowed as an offset to the expense saved the Government for collection. A number of the States assumed their respective quotas, and some of them, as Ohio, sold bonds to raise the money at once. Though the direct tax was discontinued after the first year, yet on June 7, 1862, as already stated, the act was passed for enforcing the original quotas of the twenty million on the "insurrectionary States," and they were not authorized to assume the tax. In the year 1866 the States of Georgia and Texas desired and by act of their respective Legislatures provided for the assumption and immediate payment by them, respectively, of their quotas, and Governors Jenkins and Throckmorton made application to the Secretary of the Treasury for permission to assume and pay these quotas, and were refused because the law did not authorize this to be done by the insurrectionary States.

I ask special attention to this part of the question. On the statute-books of the State of Georgia and of the State of Texas statutes were placed authorizing the assumption by those States, respectively, for the people of those States of these debts, and their governors, Throckmorton and Jenkins, came to the Federal Government offering to pay for their people and make their settlement; and it was not allowed because the Government held that the act of 1862 did not authorize such assumption by the insurrectionary States.

Moreover, the tax in those States by this act was fixed and assessed upon the land alone, and was not only made a lien upon the land but by section 4 the title to said land was declared to be forfeited to the United States.

At the beginning of this movement to have these inequalities in the enforcement and operation of this law equalized and adjusted in some way, the construction of the Treasury Department on this section 4 was that it operated as an absolute forfeiture, and that when lands were bought in at the direct-tax sales by the United States for sums ever so much in excess of the taxes, the Government was not liable to pay to the owner the surplus of such sales in excess of such bids.

The case of S. G. Lawton vs. United States was brought in the Court of Claims to recover the surplus proceeds of sale over the taxes and charges where the Government was the purchaser, and an examination of the case in 18 Court of Claims Report, 595, will show that it was rigorously defended on the express ground that the owners were not entitled to the surplus where the Government was the purchaser.

By section 14 of the act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stat. L., 331), as I have stated, the Secretary of the Treasury was "authorized to suspend the collection, in any of the States heretofore declared in insurrection, of the direct tax," etc., and this suspension was subsequently, by joint resolution, suspended until January, 1869. These uncollected balances, therefore, in these States still remain a specific lien on each and every tract of land wherever the tax has not been paid, and the enforcement of this lien is suspended merely.

The Secretary was authorized by law to suspend only, and to suspend until a definite, fixed date, to wit, January 1, 1869; so that beyond question it is the legal duty of the Secretary to enforce these liens and collect this tax, and no legislation for that purpose is needed on the subject.

But, Mr. Chairman, the money is not needed, and the enforcement of its collection would be attended with such hardship as necessarily to create great friction; but the question remains whether it is just and right, when the other States have paid seven-eighths of these taxes, that these States in default shall continue to withhold the balance of their quotas?

Ought not they to come and tender to the Government the amount of the original quotas assessed against their States, or else not contend against the equity of an enactment which would adjust the matter so as to give them a complete acquittance and return to us simply the dollars and cents that we paid into the Treasury?

Every dictate of reason and suggestion of fairness demands that either these balances should be collected or that the sums already paid shall be refunded.

Equality is equity, and one or the other of these alternative propositions will come nearer working equity than any which can be suggested; and nothing can be more unequal or unjust than the present situation of affairs relating to this business.

Mr. MCRAE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HEARD. I will yield, but I hope it will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that it will be taken out of his time.

Mr. HEARD. Then I must decline to yield.

Mr. MCRAE. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman this. I understood him to say that he believed this tax was a lien.

Mr. HEARD. I do.

Mr. MCRAE. What do you do with the clause which provides that it shall not be a lien after two years?

Mr. HEARD. There is no such provision in the supplementary act of 1862 applicable to the insurrectionary States.

Mr. MCRAE. Where is the conflict between the two acts?

Mr. HEARD. The limitation of two years, which is contained in the first act, is not repeated in the second, but it is made a lien without limitation and the title declared forfeited to the United States. I hope my friend will not interrupt me further at this time.

But, Mr. Chairman, great as has been the inequality in results as to the enforcement of this direct tax between the States of the Union, it has been exceeded by the hardships and inequality wrought in the manner of its enforcement in particular States. These facts of themselves present an irresistible argument for the passage of this bill, so as to equalize matters now as far as may possibly be done.

I ask every member who desires to be guided by the conceded principles of law buttressed upon the Constitution as conceded by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] whether his course here observes the equities of the situation. I ask every man to consider the hardships which, unless we extend the benefits of this act, the law will have perpetrated upon some of the people of those States in which the tax was wrung from them, in some cases by virtual confiscation.

Take the State of Virginia. The quota assessed upon her entire real estate was $729,071.02, whereof there was collected by the Government commissioners $515,569.72, leaving a balance of $213,501.30, which, as we have seen, constitutes a lien and a cloud on the title of the real estate which has not paid the taxes. The commissioners charged with the execution of this law in Virginia, without any warrant of legal authority, ingrafted upon the statute by the adoption of a rule of practice a provision that the taxes could only be paid by the owner of the land in person. A friend or an agent was not permitted to pay it. In consequence of this unlawful requirement, large quantities of land were unnecessarily as well as illegally sold to enforce the collection of the tax. Let it be said to-day, in justice to his memory, that James A. Garfield went before the Supreme Court of the United States and demonstrated the illegality of this rule and denounced this outrage, and that tribunal, in Bennett vs. Hunter (9 Wall., 314), placed the seal of its condemnation upon this part of the administration of these commissioners.

But the people whose lands had thus been confiscated have had no redress. How will they have redress? By proceeding to enforce the old law? Oh, no; but by returning to the States, as trustees for these people, the money which was thus taken from them, as this bill proposes.

Now, in the name of reason and justice I ask if there can be a fair objection raised to the return of this $515,509.72 to the individuals who paid it or their representatives, when the people of the great and prosperous States of Alabama, Mississippi, and Georgia have not paid the first dollar upon the quotas assessed upon them respectively.

Why should these three States, or others similarly situated, be found antagonizing this bill, when, under the law as it stands to-day upon your statute-book, unrepealed and unimpaired, they are not only liable for those quotas assessed upon them, but in addition thereto to a penalty of 50 per cent. and interest on the tax itself at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from July 1, 1862, until paid—in other words, whilst those States not only owe their quotas but more than three times their original quotas, all of which is an enforceable lien on "each piece, parcel, and tract of land respectively" in those States?

Take the State of Arkansas. Her quota is $261,886, and if this bill becomes a law it will return $184,082.18 to her citizens which has been collected from them, very largely, by sales of their real estate at great sacrifice, and will not only release her from the balance of $77,803.82, but also from the penalty of 50 per cent. and some twenty-six years' interest at 10 per cent. per annum. (See section 7 of the act of June 7, 1862.)

What I have said as to Virginia and Arkansas is practically true as to Tennessee, Florida, and North Carolina, and in this connection I desire to call attention to the fact that the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the discharge of his official duty, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Louisiana case, and pointing out how it would affect the balances against Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi, felt bound to make the following suggestion, to wit:

"I suggest that the question whether the United States has now any authority for the collection of the tax remaining unpaid be taken into consideration. If it is held that the tax can be collected, proper steps should be taken to collect it, unless there is some probability of legislative action authorizing further suspension."

The case of South Carolina, however, is even more extraordinary in in its peculiar hardships and inequalities, growing very largely out of the wholly illegal conduct of the commissioners.

We have already said that in the insurrectionary States the act of June 7, 1862, fixed the tax upon the real estate alone; and by the first section of that act each piece was to pay a tax in the proportion to the quota of the State that its assessed value bore to all the real estate of the State; and by the next section this tax is made a lien on this real estate; and by section 4 the title is declared to be forfeited to the United States. The first thing which these commissioners did was to assess a tax of $2 per $100 worth on the agricultural real estate of this State, and the Court of Claims (volume 21, page 39) has decided the rate should only have been $1.17 per $100 worth. To this sum penalty and interest were unlawfully added, and the lands were sold in large quantities upon this unlawfully assessed tax.

By the decisions of the same court it is apparent that whilst just after the war the real estate was in the hands of the military forces of the Union, the tax was enforced as a condition precedent to the restoration of the property, but adding interest at 10 per cent. per annum for between three and four years, which the Court of Claims held was illegal and unwarrantable. (19 Court of Claims Reports, Timms's case and Harrison's case.)

Time will not suffice to go into all of the inequalities in detail in the different States. I have only sought to mention a few of them for the purposes of illustration.

It is on account of the great injustice done by these inequalities that so many public officers of high position, who have been called on in the discharge of their public duties to deal with these questions, have recommended that something be done to equalize this tax, either by collecting the balances or else to remit the balances and return the sums collected to the States who have paid it. This bill provides for this, and provides that if the sums have been paid out of the common treasury of the State, then it should be returned to the States for public use. If it was paid by individuals or collected by the sale of the lands of individual citizens, then in that case it is paid to the States respectively in trust for the citizens who paid it. This is equitable, and the States can be trusted to deal honestly with their citizens, and I submit that sound statesmanship demands the passage of this bill as both a wise and a just measure.

Now, Mr. Chairman [Mr. HATCH in the chair], in conclusion, let me say I do not stand here to-day as a representative in part of our great State, prosperous and strong as she is, to demand the pound of flesh. I do not ask that this law be rigorously enforced and these people burdened with its enforcement, but I ask that those who have contributed nothing shall permit those States which, in obedience to their convictions of duty and in compliance with a law which is conceded to have been constitutionally enacted, paid the tax, to receive back the money which they thus paid into the Treasury. It takes nothing from the States which have not paid. Missouri asks nothing but justice from any State. Her people are able to meet all just demands upon them. But Missouri as a State has a right and, in the interest of her people, it is her duty to demand that the money which was contributed by them during the war, when they were making a heroic struggle for existence itself, shall be returned to them. We scorn any advantage. We ask those whom we have heretofore favored to now be just to us. We ask nothing more.

[Mr. WHEELER withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, the point to which I wish to direct my remarks is not covered by the bill now before the House, but is covered by the amendment I shall offer to the bill, and which I shall print as a part of my remarks:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to such person as shall in each case apply therefor and furnish satisfactory evidence that such applicant was at the time of the sales hereinafter mentioned the legal owner, or is the heir at law or devisee of the legal owner of such lands as were sold in the parishes of St. Helena and St. Luke's, in the State of South Carolina, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imposts, to pay interest on the public debt," approved August 5, 1861, and the acts amendatory thereto, the value of these said lands in the following manner, to wit:

To the owners of the lots in the town of Beaufort, the value assessed thereon for taxation by the United States direct-tax commissioners for South Carolina.

To the owners of lands which in the year 1860 were rated for taxation as being usually cultivated, or capable of cultivation, $15 per acre for each acre thereof returned on the proper tax-book.

To the owners of all other lands $3 per acre for each acre thereof returned on said tax-books: Provided, That in all cases where such owners, or persons claiming under them, have redeemed or purchased said lands, or any part thereof, from the United States they shall not receive compensation for such part so redeemed or purchased, but they shall receive whatever amounts were paid by them to the United States for such redemption or purchase: And provided further, That in all cases where said owners have heretofore received from the United States the surplus proceeds arising from the sale of their lands such sums shall be deducted from the sum which they are entitled to receive under this act.

SEC. 5. That in all cases where persons, while serving in the Army or Navy or Marine Corps of the United States, purchased any of said real estate under section 11 of the act of Congress approved June 7, 1862, and such lands afterward reverted to the United States, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to such person as shall in each case apply therefor, or to their heirs at law, devisees, or grantees in good faith and for valuable consideration whatever sum was so paid to the United States in such case.

SEC. 6. That before paying any money under this act the Secretary of the Treasury shall require the person or persons entitled to receive the same to execute a release of all claims and demands of every kind and description whatever against the United States arising out of the execution of said acts, and also a release of all right, title, and interest in and to the said lands.

SEC. 7. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to pay the money directed by this act to be paid to said parties.

SEC. 8. That section 1063 of the Revised Statutes is hereby made applicable to claims of individuals arising under this act without limitation as to the amount involved in such claim.

The occasion for this legislation grows out of the enforcement of the direct-tax acts in that portion of South Carolina known as the parishes of St. Helena and St. Luke. In the year 1862, when that country was in the undisputed control of the United States troops, commissioners were sent there for the purpose of enforcing the act of 1861 and the supplemental act of 1862. They sold the entire town of Beaufort, and the whole of St. Helena Parish, consisting of 80,000 acres, as well as a large part of the parish of St. Luke, containing about 30,000 acres. So it has come about that that entire section of country, by reason of these direct-tax sales, passed out of the hands of the original owners, and today, with the exception of a few cases where the original owners have again come into the possession of their property, either by purchase or redemption—with those exceptions there is in this free country an entire community who have no home they can call their own and no place to lay their heads.

How was this law enforced? First, as to the assessment. What was the first thing the direct-tax commissioners did?

And I wish here to state that everything I will set forth in reference to this matter is based upon official information obtained from documents of the Government, and the one to which I shall now call attention and read is found in the report of the committee on this bill, being the result of a Treasury Department investigation two years ago.

For taxation the State was divided under State laws into the "upper division" and the "lower division," in the latter of which alone was the direct tax attempted to be levied and collected.

The commissioners fixed the entire taxable property of the State at $30,833,322.10⅘, and still imposed upon the several parishes and districts constituting the "lower division" of the State for taxation an aggregate assessed valuation of $33,750,000, or nearly $3,000,000 more than the entire estimate for the State, leaving unassessed the "upper division," which, under the State law, constituted more than one-fourth the taxable value of lands in the State and about three-fourths the State's area.

The commissioners imposed upon farming lands—all property not in towns, etc.—a tax of "$2 ad valorem for each $100 valuation," and "upon the city, town, village, and borough lots the sum of 80 cents ad valorem on each $100 of valuation." This has very recently been the subject of judicial inquiry before the Court of Claims, where it has been held that the assessment should have been the same for all classes of property, and that any assessment in excess of such a levy is erroneous, and the amounts collected thereunder in excess of the proper sums should be refunded to the land-owners paying the same.

Further on the report proceeds:

The report of the comptroller-general of South Carolina for 1860, adding thereto the assessment for Union County for the next fiscal year, which is substantially correct, as no return for this county seems to have been received or incorporated in the first of the said reports, shows as taxable real estate in the entire State $41,924,074, of which $30,090,507 was in the "lower division." Then, if $41,924,074 should pay $363,570.67, the quota of the State, $30,090,507 should pay $260,948.53. But upon this lower division the commissioners levied $348,283.34, $87,334.81 more than its proportion. Should the rate of taxation have been uniform, each land-owner has been compelled to pay 33.8 per cent. more than could be imposed under the law.

The same figures will show that the assessment for this State should have been 80 cents (about) on each $100 valuation. Town property has, then, paid 6 cents too little and country property $1.14 too much on each $100 valuation.

It is probable that there will yet be presented numerous claims for refunding amounts erroneously collected, both here and in other States. Each sum refunded, and which was heretofore credited to the State on account of tax, will necessarily affect the amount due from the State. And hence the necessity of the observations upon this point.

That is from the report of the Treasury Department, and shows an extraordinary condition of things. It shows that the direct-tax levy upon the lands named in the parishes I have described was altogether excessive, and the appraised valuation of the lands for taxation was entirely disproportionate, a vast difference being made between the two classes of lands, to wit, country property and town lots.

Another great piece of injustice was in the fact that the tax was levied upon each piece of property without regard to the fact that the owner may have had several pieces, either of which would have been sufficient of itself to have paid the tax upon the whole.

I will mention a single instance, where the owner had 2,550 acres of land divided into four separate tracts, the total value of which was $62,750. He was also the owner of a lot in the town of Beaufort valued at $8,500, making a total of $72,250, and the whole of that property was sold to collect the sum of the tax levied against each piece, amounting in all to $296.

I wish further to state, Mr. Chairman, that when the commissioners advertised for sale the property in the town of Beaufort instead of adhering in their notice of sale to the original plat, which had been in existence for over one hundred years and was in their possession, they made a new plat of their own, and advertised the property according to that, entirely changing the designation by which the lands had previously for all this period been known. Lots had formerly been numbered from 1 to 500 without reference to the subdivision of blocks, but the commissioners arranged the town in a system of blocks, numbering the blocks and lettering the lots in each block, so that a lot formerly known, for example, as No. 20 under the old plat was advertised for sale as lot A, in block 10. Hence the owners, even if they had by chance seen the advertisements, would still have been unable to tell by any possible means that the property so advertised for sale was theirs.

But in point of fact the whole people of that town and that portion of the country had left upon the fall of Port Royal, and when the property was sold there was not a solitary owner of it present.

These sales took place in 1863, at a time when General Hunter was in command of that military department. Realizing the absurdity of having property sold under these conditions, he issued a peremptory order, addressed to the tax commissioners, forbidding them to proceed further. They nevertheless undertook to sell certain property, proceeding with the sale from day to day, until finally the matter culminated in an order which alone I shall have time now to read. It is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS UNITED STATES FORCES, PORT ROYAL ISLAND,
Beaufort, S. C., February 12, 1863.

SIR: I am instructed by the colonel commanding these forces to inform you that if you attempt to continue the sale of land, or sell another lot, without orders from the department headquarters, to arrest you and send you there under guard.

I am, sir, very respectfully, etc.,

S. S. STEPHENS,
Lieutenant Sixth Connecticut Volunteers, A. A. A. G.

Mr. A. D. SMITH,
Direct-Tax Commissioner.

Notwithstanding that, Mr. Chairman, they proceeded to sell the property. The Government needed some of the property for Government purposes, and a board of selection was organized consisting of these direct-tax commissioners and Generals Hunter and Saxton; and an order to select such property as the Government needed for Government purposes was issued. Under that order they bid in at the tax sale to which I have already referred, with the exception of three unimportant lots belonging to colored people, every one of the lots in the town of Beaufort, which had been assessed by them at $515,700 for the pitiful sum of $17,512, being about one-thirtieth of the assessed value placed upon it by the commissioners themselves.

They also selected 39,000 acres of land which were assessed at $115,000, but which were bid in at $13,000, the price realized being about 34 cents an acre. They also bid in some 19,500 acres for $10,000, the price paid being equal to 56 cents per acre; and the whole of this property, excepting that in St. Luke's Parish, was sacrificed for the purpose of collecting the sum of about $9,000. I wish to emphasize the fact that the whole town of Beaufort, valued by the commissioners themselves at $515,000, and all of these 70,000 acres of land were sold for the purpose of collecting $9,000 of taxes. Thus this property became vested in the United States. What was done with it?

Under what were called army and navy sales in 1864 all of this property was advertised for resale, or so much of it as the Government did not then want; and special privileges were given soldiers and sailors of the United States. It was provided that they should pay only one-fourth of the purchase-money and should have three years in which to pay the remainder. Those who had paid one-fourth finding themselves at the end of three years unable to pay the balance, the property was disposed of a third time, thereby placing in the Treasury further proceeds from the sale of this property.

One of the provisions of this bill is to refund to those soldiers and sailors the amount they paid, one-fourth cash.

Further, in the Freedmen's Bureau act the Government undertook to dispose of the plantation lands in small lots in order to provide homes for the colored people who had been residing on them; and under the law the price was fixed at $1.50 per acre, although they were then worth $25 to $30 per acre. No white man was allowed to bid and the colored purchasers could not pay more than the $1.50. I am not complaining of this disposition of the property. I am merely showing that the Government took it for the purpose of carrying out certain schemes, and in that way it did not yield so large a sum as it otherwise would have done.

Under a subsequent act of Congress there have been in all about 40,000 acres of land redeemed, and a large portion of the town of Beaufort has been reacquired by the former owners by redemption or purchase, so that a large amount of this property is eliminated from any scheme of settlement to be adopted.

I have described very briefly what was done and the numerous violations of law. I submit they represent a condition of things which demands that in some way a remedy should be given for the great sufferings imposed on this community so far exceeding those borne by the people of any other section. In one way and another the Government has derived from these sales, resales, and leases about $400,000, of which about $320,000 is now in the Treasury, and has been there for twenty years.

Many attacks have been made upon the legality of these proceedings apart from those to which I have referred. In Taylor's case, reported in 104 U. S., 216, the Supreme Court decided that the Government had no right to retain the surplus of the first sales over and above the tax, but that it should in each case be repaid to the persons whose property had produced it, and under this decision small sums have been paid from the Treasury in many cases.

The scheme of settlement provided by the amendment is to pay the former owners of the property some moderate compensation for their losses. In the town of Beaufort the value fixed upon the lots is that which was placed upon them by the tax commissioners for taxation. All other property is valued at about one-half its former value. A careful examination of the details of the amendment will show that the Government is fully protected from imposition.

Mr. HEARD. I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. CASWELL. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the year 1861 will ever be memorable in the annals of American history. Men clad in a strange garb and following a strange flag seized the property of the Government, set up an insurgent government, marched upon the national capital, and, announcing their intention to utterly destroy that which our fathers had builded with so much care and cemented with their blood, sought by all the resources at their command to make good their boast.

This effort was met by the loyal States with indomitable courage and heroic sacrifice. Among the measures devised to provide for the national defense was the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861. Section 8 of that bill contained a provision which has, by the operations under it, given rise to the bill now before us for consideration. That section provides—

That a direct tax of $20,000,000 be, and is hereby, annually laid upon the United States, and the same shall be, and is hereby, apportioned to the States, respectively, in manner following.

And the apportionment to each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia then follows as the remainder of that section. The bill then goes on to provide the machinery for the collection of this tax. Section 53 provides that any State or Territory or the District of Columbia—

May lawfully assume, assess, collect, and pay into the Treasury of the United States the direct tax or its quota thereof imposed by this act upon the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in its own way and manner, by and through its own officers, assessors, and collectors.

And then provides that in such case such State so assuming, collecting, and paying, and thus relieving the General Government of the expense of such collection, should be therefor entitled to a deduction of 15 per cent. for such collection. Amendments to these provisions were subsequently made, but the essential features of the legislation I have spoken of were not changed.

Under this statute some of the States assumed the collection and payment of their several quotas, and were allowed the 15 per cent. for so doing. Other States refused to collect and pay, and the Government agents enforced the collection in whole or in part, except as to Utah, which paid nothing, and from which nothing was at any time collected.

Although this tax was an annual tax, no attempt was made to levy or collect it beyond the first year. Other means of raising money were found, and this tax, so unequal in its operation, paid only by the loyal States, or enforced by seizure and sale in conquered territory, already impoverished by the misfortunes of war, was abandoned. By a report from Ros. A. Fish, Assistant Register of the Treasury, dated March 22, 1886, the amount levied upon the several States, the per cent. allowed for collection, the amount collected in each instance, and the balance remaining due, as appears by the books of the Treasury up to that date, is shown. As that report is in tabular form, and shows all this at a glance, I will take the liberty of incorporating it as a part of my remarks.

Statement of the condition of the direct-tax accounts of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, under acts of August 5, 1861, and June 7, 1862, as appears from the books of the Register of the Treasury to date.

ROS. A. FISH,
Assistant Register.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Register's Office, March 22, 1886.

In transmitting this statement, however, to this House, Hon. C. S. Fairchild, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, calls attention to some matters which make some of the items in this table subject to qualification. He says:

From this statement it appears that no distinction has been made in the sums of money charged and collected as tax, as penalty, costs, and interest, or as surplus proceeds of direct-tax sales, which are now being refunded to original owners, but that the Register's books show the gross receipts under these several heads, additional to the respective, to have been credited to the tax quotas alone as the same have been received and covered into the Treasury. On the other hand, amounts covered in as received from the direct-tax commissioners are credited to them and not credited to the States they represent. It is therefore manifest that many of the amounts set forth as balances due to the United States from the States and Territories are not the amounts really due therefrom, some being much too small and others too large.

And he announces the appointment of a commission "to examine into and report upon direct-tax accounts, with a view to the early adjustment thereof;" and he transmits also the table of quotas charged, amounts credited, and amounts due, as revised by them, after making the proper readjustments. That table is as follows:

The amount of direct taxes which has been paid is not stated in any summary, but I have collected from the report the amount of taxes paid and the amount of credits allowed, or to be allowed, and the amount now due, which may be summarized as follows:

Paid or credited	17,359,685.51
Amount due	2,640,314.49

The second column includes taxes collected, amount of 15 per cent. deduction, and credits allowed.

By this table it will be observed that $2,640,314.49 remains uncollected from fourteen States and Territories, that $17,359,685.51 was paid by the States and Territories; and of these twenty-nine, each paid in full. This table is the strongest argument which can be presented showing the inequalities of this collection. For instance, while Alabama's quota was $529,313.33, she still owes $511,028.30; Wisconsin's quota was $519,688.67; she has paid it all. Tennessee's quota was $669,498; she still owes $277,493.52. Indiana's quota was $904,875.33. It was paid. Mississippi's quota was $413,084.67; she still owes $302,046.21. New Jersey's quota was $450,134; and every cent of it has been paid. To make things equal, this tax should be collected from all or refunded to all. This uncollected tax has been the subject of much controversy in the past between the Treasury officials and some of the States still in arrears. Some of these States, having claims against the General Government, have, upon their presentation, been met by the officials of the Treasury with their unpaid balance of this tax as a set-off.

This claim of set-off they have resisted, though it is a perfectly equitable one, and indeed the matter has gone so far that at the last Congress Mr. Hammond, then a Representative from Georgia, a State which, as will be seen, is still $466,384.44 in arrears, introduced and most persistently urged a bill forbidding the Government from presenting this unpaid tax bill as an offset to the claim of any State against the Government. The performances on this floor yesterday and to-day also are significant and merit notice. The persistent effort yesterday to defeat the proposition setting apart time for the consideration of this bill was led by a gentleman from Alabama, whose quota was by the above table $529,313.33, upon which is credited only $18,285.03, leaving due $511,028.30, and voting with him were almost exclusively gentlemen from the States yet in arrears, and it really seemed that the greater the arrears the more persistent the activity in opposition. Some notable exceptions to this were noticed among gentlemen who, although from such States, realize the justice and equity of the proposed measure.

What is the proposed measure? It is, shortly, this:

First. That the sum collected from each State by collection, set-off, or otherwise shall be credited to such State.

Second. That all moneys still due shall be remitted and relinquished.

Third. That the sums collected from each State shall be returned to it absolutely where the State paid it as a State, and where it was collected by the Government of individuals in a State, in trust, to repay to such individuals.

If the collection of this tax is not to be completed—and no one advocates that nor claims that it is needed—no fairer way, in my judgment, of correcting this inequality can be devised than the provision made by the bill before us.

Bitterly as this measure is being fought, even this falls far short of doing exact justice. Many of the States which assumed and paid this tax borrowed the money with which they paid it, and in some instances such States have paid interest on this money so borrowed from them until the present. My own State paid (with the 15 per cent. allowance) $450,134. She paid that money in 1861, now nearly twenty-seven years ago. She issued bonds for her war debt. Many of those bonds bore 7 per cent interest. But if we reckon interest on $450,134 for twenty-five years at 6 per cent. we have the sum of $675,201 for interest alone, which my State should be repaid to put her upon an equality with Utah, which paid nothing, or with Alabama, which has paid next to nothing.

Mr. Chairman, there is no "section" in this measure. There is no politics in it. There is one simple, straightforward proposition to do justice to all, so far as the principal paid is concerned, and I am amazed at the fierce opposition it encounters. From whence comes that opposition? Yesterday, upon the vote to fix a time for the consideration of this bill, the proceedings, as shown by the RECORD, were—

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

A MEMBER. What is the amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. The effect of the amendment is simply to give to the Judiciary Committee control of the business which shall be called up on these two days.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposes to strike out so much of the resolution as provides that the bill in relation to the refund of the direct tax shall be first considered.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I call for the reading of the words proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Strike out the words 'be set apart for the consideration of Senate bill 139, to provide for refunding the direct tax levied in 1861.'"

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. OATES, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

A division was called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 98.

Mr. OATES. No quorum.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and Mr. DIBBLE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 161; as follows:

An analysis of this vote shows the yeas are almost entirely from States in arrears, and it may not be entirely amiss to inquire whether these States are truly represented in sentiment by this attempt to defeat the consideration of a bill designed to do but equity and justice to those States which in the hour of trial stood by the Union not only with men, but with means.

Sir, we hear much of a reunited country. God hasten the day when it may be united truly in interest, sentiment, and heart. But, sir, the time has not yet come when the American Congress will impose a penalty upon patriotism or offer a premium upon its opposite.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], who spoke last, expressed some surprise that the friends of this bill did not unite with him in voting to take up the appropriation bill which he claims appropriates nearly eighty millions of money to disabled soldiers and sailors of the Federal Army and Navy. I can say to the gentleman, for one, and I think I speak the sentiments of many who voted with me, that in the varied and historic career which he has thus far had this new character in which he appeared was so surprising that I questioned somewhat the honesty of his motives.

But I say to him that I congratulate him upon the new light which he seems to have received and the new rôle in which he appears, and that from now on whenever he has occasion to pose as the friend of the Federal soldiers he will find that we on this side, and, I think, all the friends of this bill, will unite with him in taking up that measure or voting for any measure to give pensions to the honest and faithful soldiers who served this country.

Mr. Chairman, this bill under consideration has been made necessary, as was so ably and so clearly stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR], by the passage of an act upon the 5th day of August, 1861, assessing a tax of $20,000,000 upon the United States and apportioning it among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia. The condition of affairs in this country at that time is too well known to members of this House to make it necessary for me to dwell upon it.

A depleted Treasury was one of the problems that the Government had to contend with, and a direct tax was one of the modes that at that time was thought advisable to resort to in order to raise armies and a navy to maintain the integrity of this Union.

A direct tax has always been regarded with great disfavor by the people. While the power to levy such a tax is recognized in the Constitution, yet, during a period of one hundred years of national existence under that grand instrument, that mode of taxation has been resorted to but four times, and in every instance, Mr. Chairman, it has been found that it was not an efficient way of raising revenue, indeed that it was the worst possible manner of collecting money from the people; but the needs of the country at the time of the passage of the act of 1861 were such that Congress deemed it advisable to resort to that method of taxation, and as an inducement to the loyal States which were exerting themselves in every laudable and patriotic manner possible to maintain the integrity of the Union, it was provided that if any of those States would assume the amount of the tax which was apportioned to its citizens a commission of 15 per cent. would be allowed to the State for so doing. Under that provision the loyal and patriotic States at the North assumed the responsibility and paid out of their own treasuries this large amount of money, and, as has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] in opening this debate, in order to do that they were compelled, many of them, to borrow money, and several of them have now a large indebtedness which can be traced directly to their efforts at that time to sustain the arm of the Government in its hour of trial.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but the States that did not see fit to take advantage of this provision of the act have from time to time had collected from the citizens living within their territory sums of money ranging from a few thousand up to hundreds of thousands of dollars. Wherever the Government has sought to collect the unpaid balance of this twenty millions it has been found that individual hardships resulted, and to such an extent that the Congress of the United States by various acts suspended the operation of the law in the so-called Confederate States, and, as was stated by the gentleman from Alabama who opposes this bill [Mr. OATES], for nearly twenty years this law has remained practically a dead letter on the statute-book.

I appeal to members from that section of the country to state whether his opposition to this bill comes now with a very good grace. The people who represented the loyal States in preceding Congresses realized the forlorn condition of the Southern States at the close of the civil war, which has been so ably and eloquently pictured by the gentleman from Alabama in his argument here, and for that reason they suspended the operation of this law.

For a Representative of that portion of the country to contend now that the tax which was paid by the loyal States shall not be refunded is to exhibit an ingratitude as base as ever cursed the fate of King Lear.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me a remark just there?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. My answer to that point is that in the cotton tax you got from us our two and one-half millions of this tax which we failed to pay, and sixty-two and one-half millions besides.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman on that point when I come to deal with the cotton tax. The gentleman's answer is no answer so far as this tax is concerned. If it is wrong to enforce this direct tax against the people of the Southern States it is no answer to say that another alleged wrong should be pitted against this. If this was a tax proper to be enforced against the States of the North, there is no legal, moral, or equitable reason that can be urged against its enforcement in the Southern States. The reason for the raising of this tax was the rebellious and treasonable spirit then existing in the Southern States. The object for which that money was raised was to suppress the rebellion and to restore the integrity of the Union; a blessing to all, as these men themselves acknowledge to-day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I, for one, am willing to say that the two million six hundred and odd thousand dollars that still remain uncollected of this tax shall be canceled, and that the people of those States that have not paid it shall not be required to pay it; but the same spirit which says that demands that the States of the North which have paid their fifteen or sixteen millions of money shall have that amount restored to them.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent responded promptly to the call of the General Government and raised $974,568.63 of this $20,000,000 by taxation from her people. That money, Mr. Chairman, which aggregates nearly a million of dollars, was used to arm and equip the soldiers which Illinois furnished to the Federal Army. Her money and the best blood of her people were freely given to preserve the heritage of our fathers and to maintain the Union and perpetuate free government on American soil. The citizens of that glorious Commonwealth, in responding to this call from our National Government, did not stop to inquire whether it was constitutional to pay this money. They saw one section of this great Republic in armed resistance to the national administration. They saw the Constitution, which is so sacred in the eyes of the gentlemen to-day who oppose this bill, trampled upon and disregarded. They saw defiance hurled at our flag and an attempt to create a Confederate government on the ruins of our glorious Union of States. This was enough for them. The time has now come when the National Government can restore this money to Illinois and the other States which so nobly responded to the call of country. In the discussion here to-day I put the question directly to the gentleman from Alabama, as to whether he favored the collection of the unpaid balance of the $20,000,000 from the people living in the once "insurrectionary territory?" His answer must have satisfied the House that he is as hostile to that as he is to the passage of the pending bill, and all, I suppose, on constitutional grounds.

As I take it, Mr. Chairman, this case is different from what it would be if this tax had been entirely collected. We admit that the Government had the right to levy this tax; we admit that it was constitutional; but what we claim is that the law as it stands to-day is unexecuted; that the strong arm of the Government has been stayed in the collection of this tax; and the same power that checks the arm of the Government in collecting that tax from the Southern portion of the country can say that the money already collected under this tax law from another portion of the country should be restored to those States. This is the position, as I understand, which was taken by Secretary Folger in his able letter to the Senate of the United States. It is the position which has been taken by every Secretary of the Treasury who has occupied that great position for the last fifteen years. It is the position which such Democratic leaders as Senator BECK, of Kentucky, and other men at the other end of the Capitol have taken when they voted to refund this money to loyal States of the North. I repeat, the case is different from what it would have been if the tax had been entirely collected.

The gentleman says the reason he does not desire that this tax should be collected from the Southern States is that $68,000,000 was collected under the cotton-tax act; and he has made an argument here this afternoon that that law is unconstitutional. There is one thing to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman and other members of the House. It would be a little remarkable for this House to attempt to repeal upon the ground of unconstitutionality a law passed by a previous Congress when no court has decided that the law is unconstitutional. The place to test the unconstitutionality of acts passed by Congress is not in the Hall of this House, but in the courts provided for that purpose; and I say to these gentlemen who question the legality of the cotton tax, let them first go to the courts of the country; and when they can get the Supreme Court of the United States to say that law is unconstitutional, they will not find me or any other man who advocates the passage of the present bill voting against the repeal of that law or the refunding of the money collected thereunder. But it is unseemly to inject a matter of that kind, by amendment or otherwise, into legislation like the pending bill. All can see it is not to get consideration of the cotton-tax acts, but is one of the modes used to defeat this bill.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], in his argument this afternoon, said that he experienced no surprise that gentlemen on this side of the Chamber should vote for this measure, because they are "latitudinarians" in the construction of the Constitution; but he made a special appeal to members of the Democratic party to stand by him in the defeat of this measure. In doing so he claimed that he is a Jeffersonian Democrat, and stands by the principles of the Constitution as expounded by that great master. I would ask the gentleman what clause of the Constitution President Jefferson found to warrant his action in the purchase of the Louisiana Territory?

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman yield for an answer?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. Does not the gentleman from Illinois know, has he not studied the Constitution enough to know, that that instrument operates only on the parties to its creation—only among and over the States? Let me say to the gentleman that it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case which came from the State of Florida, that in respect to the foreign policy of the Government the Constitution imposes no limitation; that the discretion of the President and Congress is the only limit upon the expenditure of money in connection with any measure of foreign policy, such questions being outside the province of the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Jefferson himself had grave doubts about the constitutionality of his action in that matter.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, at the time of the purchase of that great territory which added an empire to this country, the very President who negotiated the purchase acknowledged that he could find no provision in the Constitution which would warrant it. But he was not trammeled by the dotting of i's or the crossing of t's. He looked to the greatness and glory of the country rather than to the technicalities of the Constitution. On the same principle I can say to the gentleman that whatever provision of the Constitution he may invoke, everybody knows that this is a just and equitable measure; everybody knows that it will tend to the general welfare of the people, will restore harmony of feeling and wipe out heart-burnings between the different sections of our country. The principles of that great instrument, the Constitution, which in the course of a hundred years has made us one of the greatest and most glorious nations that the sun has ever shone upon, warrant this measure as fully and completely as they warranted the purchase of that great empire by President Jefferson.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion upon the historical question?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. While it is true that Mr. Jefferson did not believe he had constitutional power to buy Louisiana, and while it is also true that he tried to get members of his party in the United States Senate to propose an amendment to the Constitution for the purpose of validating that purchase, the gentleman from Illinois, if he has read the history of that period, can not but remember that the Democratic party believed that the President and the Senate, under the treaty-making power, had ample authority to acquire territory; and on that ground the Democratic leaders in the Senate declined to introduce the constitutional amendment which Mr. Jefferson suggested.

Mr. OATES. The same considerations applied in the case of Florida, of which I have spoken; and the Supreme Court so held.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. At the same time, the leaders of the Democratic party claimed that the territory acquired by the Louisiana purchase was not a part of the United States in the same sense that the original thirteen colonies were; and President Jefferson himself at the time of the purchase doubted its constitutionality. But, as I have said, he looked to the greatness and glory of his country, and was not to be tied down by the pin-hook technicalities which have characterized the debate on the other side of this question here to-day.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is it not the fact that President Jefferson's reluctance in regard to the Louisiana purchase arose from the fact that the appropriation made by Congress did not look to the purchase of the entire region, but only the city of New Orleans and some contiguous territory?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. No, sir; I say to the gentleman that the grave doubts of President Jefferson were as to his right to make the purchase at all. The question suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee was merely incidental.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I have not read the history of that period aright.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I would recommend the gentleman to reread it.

Mr. MCMILLIN and Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, rose.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I can not yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield further, and will proceed without interruption.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. This digression simply illustrates that these learned constitutional lawyers differ upon all these questions.

When I see, Mr. Chairman, there is no plain provision of that Constitution which is impugned, when I see the measure which is proposed will result to the general good of the people and has received the sanction of the best constitutional lawyers in this country, who are assembled in the Senate at the other end of the Capitol, I am willing to take their judgment and the general good to the people which will result and vote for this measure.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in closing I desire to call the attention of the members of this House to the position of the gentleman who wrote the minority report of the committee and made the leading argument this afternoon against the passage of this bill. In his argument he claimed that any member who is in favor of this measure is in favor of it because the section of the country from which he happens to come is to receive some benefit from it. For one I disclaim any such motive. But if that argument is to apply, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the State from which he comes was assessed $529,000, or the inhabitants of that State were, under this direct-tax law, and not one dollar of it has ever been collected. He opposes the collection of that money from the inhabitants of his State while at the same time opposing the refunding of that portion of the tax paid by the loyal people of the North. No only that, but we find this gentleman, who is so patriotic and questions the motives of other men, is in favor of taking $68,000,000 out of the Treasury on the refunding of the cotton tax, because, as he claims, the bulk of that money goes to his own section of the country.

I would not have referred to this if he had not impugned the motives of the members of the House who favored this legislation.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman misrepresents me.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I have merely called the attention of the House to these facts to show how the gentleman's patriotism is in harmony with the interests of his own State.

Mr. OATES. Where it can be done constitutionally, I am always in favor of the interests of my constituents.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. It requires no argument to satisfy the House of that.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the argument which was made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT] this afternoon illustrates the inequalities and hardships of this direct tax and the importance of the passage of this measure. I hope there is no man who properly considers the public interest of the entire people who will vote against it. It has received the sanction, as I have said, of an almost unanimous vote of the Senate. With these remarks I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] has but two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I rose simply for the purpose of announcing that I would early to-morrow endeavor to make some arrangement in reference to closing this debate. I will add, although I have time remaining to me, I do not propose to occupy it; and, so far as I understand, the time to be used hereafter will be occupied substantially by the opponents of the bill. I desire to have a vote, but the time for the House to take a recess has now nearly arrived. While I do not wish to give way, if by consent that time can be extended——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the order of the House which fixes the recess at 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock can not be changed or modified in the committee.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (S. 139) in relation to the refunding of the direct tax, had come to no resolution thereon.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. RICE, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9143) for the relief of the estate of Ramsay Crooks, and the same was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House now take the recess fixed by the special order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the order be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the order. The order fixed by the House assigns this evening at 8 o'clock exclusively for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

And then, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the Speaker declared the House in recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., was called to order by Mr. CULBERSON, who directed the reading of the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 3, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. D. B. CULBERSON to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order of business for to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tuesday, April 3, the House shall take a recess at 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., the session to be devoted exclusively to bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs in such order as may be designated by said committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent that the business to-night may be transacted in the House as in Committee of the Whole upon such bills as properly go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that should apply to each individual bill as it comes up.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It would expediate the business very much if the gentleman would withdraw his objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. We do not know in advance what bills may be taken up. I have no information myself as to what bills are pending before the committee and would prefer that the regular order should be pursued.

ARSENAL AT COLUMBIA, TENN.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I will ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4365) to authorize the construction of an arsenal for the manufacture of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States, at Columbia, Tenn., and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of establishing an arsenal at Columbia, Tenn., for the manufacture of ordnance and ordnance stores, the sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the construction and control of said arsenal shall be under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MAISH) was read, as follows:

That pending the consideration of said bill by said committee, a proposition on behalf of said locality by the citizens thereof was submitted "to convey to the Government, without cost to it, the necessary ground for such arsenal," and that thereafter this committee submitted said bill and proposition to the Assistant Secretary of War, soliciting his views thereon, who replied as follows:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 3, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 9th ultimo, inclosing for my views House bill 4365, Fiftieth Congress, first session to authorize the construction of an arsenal at Columbia, Tenn., together with a letter addressed to you by Hon. W. C. WHITTHORNE containing propositions in relation to the subject-matter of the bill.

"In reply I beg to invite attention to the remarks of the Chief of Ordnance, contained in his report on this subject, dated the 18th ultimo, copy herewith:

"'An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1875, provided:

"'And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause an examination to be made into the condition of the United States arsenals east of the Mississippi River, and report to the next Congress how many of the same can be sold without interfering with the necessities of the military service, together with an estimate of the amount that can probably be realized from the sale of each of the same whenever such sale shall be directed by Congress.'

"In pursuance of this act a board was appointed by the Secretary of War, who, after examination and consideration, reported and recommended as follows:

"'The present absolute needs of the service demand, in the judgment of the board, all the manufacturing facilities of the Springfield Armory, Frankford, Watervliet, Watertown, and Fort Monroe Arsenals for the production of warlike stores, and the remaining ones, Kennebec, New York, Washington, Augusta, Indianapolis, and Allegheny, are required for their present uses, to wit, care and preservation, issue and receipt, and repair of ordnance and ordnance stores.'

"Of these arsenals, Fort Monroe Arsenal has been reduced to one of deposit merely, and Washington Arsenal has been transferred to the uses of the line of the Army.

"At present the whole section from Augusta, Ga., to San Antonio, Tex., has no place for deposit of warlike stores. While the necessities of this section may not be urgent at this time, and while the conditions have changed in the last few years to a very wonderful extent, the extensive and rapid means of communication, growing with the growth of the country, the establishment of an arsenal in this particular section deserves the consideration of Congress.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
"Secretary of War.

"Hon. LEVI MAISH,
"Of Committee on Military Affairs. House of Representatives."

The Secretary of War forwards with his reply the report of the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army (General Benét), made upon a reference of said bill to him by the Secretary, which is as follows:

"ORDNANCE OFFICE,
"Washington, February 18, 1888.

"Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

"Columbia is located in the central basin, in what is known as the garden of the State of Tennessee, and in close proximity to the marvelous wealth of iron and other materials that reach south into other States. The recent development of the mineral resources of this section of the country renders this an opportune time for the Government to make provision for the gradual utilization of these products. The manufacture of steel, that now enters so largely into all army and navy manufactures, follows as a consequence, and all these natural facilities and productions seem to point to this section as a proper one for the location of a Government establishment.

"The Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the Mississippi Valley have each arsenal facilities for the manufacture, repair, storage, and distribution of war supplies, and it is well to take the first step towards supplying this want in this section with its new conditions, capabilities, and importance. It being a great railroad center, this location is well fitted for such an establishment, it being in direct connection with the other portions of the country. As the citizens offer to donate all the land necessary, which should not be less than 50 acres and conveniently located for the purpose in view, I recommend the passage of this bill.

"S. V. BENÉT,
"Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance."

Columbia, the site of the proposed arsenal, is the center of one of the finest agricultural sections of the Union, and is a thriving, prosperous town of about 6,000 population; is a healthy location; in its hygienic history it has been fortunate in its exemption and escape from any and all of the fatal epidemics.

The grand trunk line of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, in its track from the Ohio River to its Pensacola, Mobile, and New Orleans connections, passes through this town. From Columbia southeast railway connection is made through the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad with Chattanooga, and thence by railroad with the railways of Georgia and South Carolina; and from Columbia by the Nashville and Florence Railroad running southwest connection is to be made with the Tennessee River and the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. This road will early have connections making communication with the States of Mississippi and Arkansas a question of but a few hours.

Its location in respect to the supply of material for the manufacture and repair of all kinds of ordnance is equally fortunate. It is in close proximity to the western iron belt of Tennessee. It is from this region that the famed "Tennessee" iron is made. It is about equidistant from the Warrior coal-fields of Alabama, the Cumberland coal-fields of Tennessee, and those of Southwestern Kentucky.

It is shown by the letter of the Secretary "that at present the whole section (of the Union) from Augusta, Ga., to San Antonio, Tex., has no place for deposit of warlike stores," and it is pertinently said by General Benét that—

"The recent development of the mineral resources of this section of the country renders this an opportune time for the Government to make provision for the gradual utilization of these products. The manufacture of steel, that now enters so largely into all army and navy manufactures, follows as a consequence, and all these natural facilities and productions seem to point to this section as a proper one for the location of a Government establishment.

"The Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the Mississippi Valley have each arsenal facilities for the manufacture, storage, and distribution of war supplies, and it is well to take the first step towards supplying this want in this section, with its new conditions, capabilities, and importance."

The committee concur in these views of the Secretary of War and the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau, and, suggesting that the bill be amended so as to conform thereto, they recommend first the following amendments:

In line 4 of the bill strike out the word "manufacture" and insert the following words, namely: "repair, storage, and distribution," and at end of section add the following words:

"Provided, That without cost to the United States, a sufficient quantity of land, accepted as suitable and adequate for such arsenal by the Secretary of War (and not less than 50 acres), is conveyed in fee to the United States: And provided further, That exclusive jurisdiction over said land by the United States Government is ceded by the State of Tennessee."

Title to be amended so as to read:

"To authorize the construction of an arsenal for the repair, storage, and distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States at Columbia, Tenn."

The bill being so amended, the committee recommend its passage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on Military Affairs, and I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE], who introduced the bill, such time as he may now desire.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, naturally I would feel much interest in this bill, its fate and fortune, from the fact that it happens to be the location of my own home; but independently of any personal feeling or consideration, deeming that whenever the Government in the pursuit of a legitimate object can give encouragement to the enterprise, skill, industry, and progress of the people it should do so, I wish simply to remark for the consideration of the House that in reference to the advisability of this construction the Secretary of War states in his communication that from the point in Georgia where the arsenal is located, Augusta, to San Antonio there is no storage depot for ordnance, no place for distribution, and no place for repair.

Looking at this broad section of our common country, with its existing advantages and great promise in the future, I submit that the reflection made by the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance that this is a wise step now on the part of the Government to take, with a view to utilizing the possibilities and capacity in this section of the country for the Government's advancement and progress, should have weight with this House; and trusting that the bill will receive the same favorable consideration by the House that it has had by the Secretary of War and from the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, as well as by the Committee on Military Affairs, I submit it for the action of the House without further comment.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word as to this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to take the floor in my own right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I reserve my time and let the gentleman from Indiana have the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not my purpose to oppose the passage of this bill, and yet I sincerely regret it is before the House. I had taken it for granted that all those depots for military supplies, like that at Indianapolis and many others that sprang up during the war period, would have long since been disposed of and sold out. There is absolutely no necessity for them. This is not supposed to be a manufacturing establishment, but simply a depot for military supplies. I look with regret upon every measure than tends to put this nation upon a military basis. I do not at all like the idea.

There are two or three important points upon the Atlantic coast, of course, which would be selected as points for the manufacture of arms. And here and there there should be a mere depository of arms. But instead of establishing a new depository for military supplies, it seems to me it would have been a gratifying thing to the whole House and to the whole country if these military appliances had been diminished instead of being enlarged.

I understand very well the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] feels very naturally an interest in having this arsenal established in his city. I appreciate that feeling; it is a commendable sentiment. I do not propose to throw obstacles in the way of the passage of the bill, but I wish to express my regret that the Military Committee, instead of enlarging the number of these military appliances, had not reported a bill to dispose of a large number of those which remain.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I thank the gentleman from Indiana for his kind expressions

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments recommended by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before that question is put I wish to make an inquiry. I observe it is provided that the ground is to be furnished by the citizens of the locality where the arsenal is to be established. I suggest that when that is done the sum to be appropriated, $200,000, seems to be very large.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. That is the limit of expenditure.

Mr. HOLMAN. There never has been a public building erected yet within the limit. I ask the chairman of the committee if he thinks that that is a proper sum to be appropriated.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think that amount can be properly intrusted to the discretion of the War Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no discretion of that kind exercised. The gentleman knows that whatever is appropriated will be expended.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will remind the gentleman from Indiana that there will require to be some machinery placed in this building.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the construction of an arsenal for the repair, storage, and distribution of ordnance and ordnance stores for the use of the Government of the United States at Columbia, Tenn."

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8809) to provide for the promotion of officers of the Army after twenty years' continuous service in one grade. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any officer of the staff of the Army, in active service, below the rank of brigadier-general, shall have served continuously in one grade for a period of twenty years, he shall be promoted to the next higher grade: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to increase the number of officers now authorized by law.

SEC. 2. That whenever any officer of the line of the Army, in active service, below the rank of brigadier-general, shall have served continuously in one grade for a period of twenty years, he shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of the next higher grade.

Mr. CRAIN. I ask the chairman of the committee if it is intended that the provisions of this bill shall apply to surgeons and assistant surgeons?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is so intended.

Mr. STEELE. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. STEELE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred House bills Nos. 1882, 3273, 5008, and 6442, have carefully considered the same, and report them back and recommend that they lie on the table, and report a substitute for the same, believing a general law covering the provisions expected to be covered by the special bills would result in increasing the efficiency of the Army by removing the inequalities existing in certain branches of the service.

As an instance under the present arrangement attention is invited to the following case——

Mr. STEELE (interrupting the reading). I hope the House will listen to the part of the report which follows. It shows very forcibly one of the inequalities and applies to a great many other officers.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the report, as follows:

"As captain commissary of subsistence, February 9, 1863, Captain Cushing ranked every major now in the Adjutant-General's Department, every lieutenant-colonel and major in the Inspector-General's Department, and every officer now in the Judge-Advocate-General's Department. He ranked three of the lieutenant-colonels and all the majors but one now in the Quartermaster's Department, every major now in the Medical Department, and every major now in the Pay Department except three. He ranked every lieutenant-colonel and major now in the Corps of Engineers, every lieutenant-colonel and major now in the Ordnance Department, and every officer now in the Signal Corps.

"He ranked every major now in the cavalry except three, every major now in the artillery except four, and every major now in the infantry. In other words, under his present commission as captain commissary of subsistance he ranked many of the lieutenant-colonels and all but eleven of the majors now in the service outside the Subsistence Department. He has been a captain nearly twenty-six years, a captain in the Subsistence Department nearly twenty-five years, and for the past three years has been senior captain in the Army. His length of continuous service as a commissioned officer exceeds that of two hundred of the majors now in service, and in his present grade of captain he has seen more than two hundred officers who were his juniors both in relative rank and length of service promoted to the grade of major."

The Lieutenant-General of the Army, in a letter (December 27, 1887) concerning the Subsistence Department, and having the above case, among others, before him, says:

"It is unnecessary for me to say that the promotion of men who have stood in one grade for so many years, as is here shown, would benefit the service."

The Secretary of War, in forwarding the letter of General Sheridan to Congress, closes by saying:

"I beg the favorable and speedy consideration of the committee for this matter."

That is, the promotion of officers who had seen from twenty to twenty-five years' service.

There are in service to-day, as your committee finds by the Army Register of this year, one hundred and twenty-three officers below the rank of colonel who have had from twenty to twenty-five years' service under one commission. The increased cost would only be about $60,000 per annum, result in much good to the service, and will relieve Congress, it is hoped, from the continual importunities and complaints that have been made for years.

Mr. SOWDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana, why was Captain Cushing kept so long from his promotion?

Mr. STEELE. Because he happened to be on the staff corps of the Army, where there are only ten officers above him. There are not so many above him as to allow promotions.

Mr. SOWDEN. If captains in these positions can not be promoted owing to the fact of so many majors still being alive, why should they be elevated so as to receive the majors' pay. Does not the bill provide that whenever any officer of the line of the Army below the rank of brigadier-general shall have served continuously in one grade for twenty years he shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of the next higher grade?

Mr. STEELE. If the gentleman will allow me I will say to him that this officer was in the staff and not in the line. He is captain commissary of subsistence.

Mr. SOWDEN. Then how does this bill affect line officers?

Mr. STEELE. Line officers, when they have served twenty years in one grade, can not be promoted to the next higher grade, because you can not have two captains of a company. There are no vacancies for them, but the bill provides that they shall get pay of the next higher grade.

Mr. SOWDEN. Why should they get the pay of major without actually doing service in the capacity of major?

Mr. STEELE. They can not do the service of a major; undoubtedly not. But they have been kept back from their promotion, and that they should be is a peculiar hardship in the service. This will not affect the majors.

Mr. FORD. When a man has served twenty years as captain he certainly should receive more pay.

Mr. McMILLIN. How many officers will be affected by the provisions of this bill?

Mr. STEELE. One hundred and twenty-three.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the increase of expenditure?

Mr. STEELE. Sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it expected that the soldier's valor will be increased by his increase of rank?

Mr. STEELE. There ought to be something to increase their valor. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move now to amend the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill, and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SOWDEN. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 1.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I voted in the negative because I wished to move to reconsider, simply for the purpose of submitting some remarks which I wish to go into the RECORD.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am willing that the gentleman shall have his remarks printed.

The bill was passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent to print certain remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express myself as most emphatically in favor of the bill now before the House. I have heretofore taken the position that the stagnation which now pervades some departments of the Army is highly detrimental to its proper organization and efficiency.

The point I wish to make is, that notwithstanding its meritorious features this bill is in no wise a substitute for bill 3273, which I had the honor to introduce January 9, 1888, which I will read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Subsistence Department of the Army shall consist of one Commissary-General of Subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of brigadier-general; three assistant commissaries-general of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonel; six assistant commissaries-general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of lieutenant-colonel; eight commissaries of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of major; and eight commissaries of subsistence, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of captain of cavalry: Provided, That the vacancies created by this act shall be filled by the promotion by seniority of the officers now in the Subsistence Department.

The purpose of this bill was to secure an effective organization for this very important department of the Army. Every other staff corps and the cavalry and infantry arms of the line of the Army have been reorganized since the close of the war, while nothing whatever has been done to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department, the only law affecting it being one enacted in 1874, which reduced the corps by four captains and provided for the appointment of an addittional lieutenant-colonel, the result being a net decrease in the corps of three officers, the appointment referred to having been made principally to do honor to a very meritorious officer. As a consequence of the nonaction on the part of Congress with reference to this corps in this long period during which other corps were reorganized and increased, a great disparity in the rank of the officers of the Subsistence Department exists to-day as compared with other branches of the service.

To illustrate this I beg to read an official statement from the Secretary of War.

STATEMENT OF FACT TO ACCOMPANY THE PROJECT FOR AN ACT RELATIVE TO THE SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 17, 1887.

The senior lieutenant-colonel of the Subsistence Department is now, and has been for more than two years, the senior officer in the grade of lieutenant-colonel in the Army. The senior major of the Subsistence Department is now the senior officer in the grade of major in the Army. The senior captain of the Subsistence Department is now, and has been for more than three years, the senior captain in the Army. They are:

1. Lieut. Col. Amos Beckwith.
2. Maj. M. R. Morgan.
3. Capt. Samuel T. Cushing.

1. Lieutenant-Colonel Beckwith entered the service as lieutenant of artillery July 1, 1850; was appointed commissary of subsistence May 10, 1861; promoted to the rank of major September 29, 1861, and to that of lieutenant-colonel June 23, 1874. He has, therefore, served in the Subsistence Department twenty-six and one-half years and in the Army thirty-seven and one-half years. Not including officers of the Subsistence Department, his length of continuous commissioned service exceeds not only that of every lieutenant-colonel now in the Army, but that of all other officers now in the Army except twenty-eight. As major he ranked every officer now in the Adjutant-General's Department except General Drum. He ranked every officer now in the Inspector-General's, Judge-Advocate-General's, and Quartermaster's Departments. He ranked all officers now in the Medical Department except Colonels Baily and McParlin, and all officers now in the Pay Department except Colonel McClure. He ranked every officer now in the Corps of Engineers, the Ordnance Department, the Signal Corps, the cavalry, artillery, and infantry, except Colonel Andrews. In other words, as major he ranked (exclusive of the Subsistence Department) all the officers now above him in the Army except five.

The average time required to pass through the grades of major and lieutenant-colonel to the rank of colonel is shown by the Army Register to be about eighteen years. Lieutenant-Colonel Beckwith has already served twenty-six years in these grades.

2. Major Morgan entered the service as a lieutenant of artillery July 1, 1854; served seven years in the line, and was appointed captain of infantry May 14, 1861; commissary of subsistence with rank of captain August 3, 1861; and promoted to his present rank (major) November 17, 1865. He has, therefore, served as a commissioned officer thirty-three and one-half years, and in his present grade (major) more than twenty-two years. As major he ranked every officer now in the Inspector-General's Department except General Baird and Colonel Jones. He ranked every officer now in the Judge-Advocate-General's Department and every officer now in the Quartermaster's Department.

He ranked every officer now in the Pay Department except Col. Daniel McClure and Col. Rodney Smith. He ranked every lieutenant-colonel now in the Corps of Engineers. He ranked every officer now in the Ordnance Department, the Signal Corps, and the cavalry, except Colonels Dudley, Brackett, Carr, and Otis. He ranked every officer now in the artillery. He ranked every officer now in the infantry except Colonels Wheaton, Carlin, Mason, Dodge, Blunt, Black, and Andrews. As captain (of infantry, in 1861), he ranked all the colonels now in the infantry except eleven, and had he remained in that arm of the service he would long since have been a colonel by regular promotion.

The continuous commissioned service of Major Morgan (thirty-three and one-half years) exceeds that of seventy of the present ninety-one lieutenant-colonels in the Army, and in his present grade of major he has seen at least seventy officers who were his juniors, both in relative rank and length of service, promoted to the grade of lieutenant-colonel.

(3) Captain Cushing entered the service as a lieutenant of infantry July 1, 1860, in which he became a captain February 15, 1862, and was appointed commissary of subsistence with rank of captain February 9, 1863. As captain, February 15, 1862, he ranked all the majors now in the Adjutant-General's, the Inspector-General's, the Judge-Advocate General's, the Quartermaster's, and the Medical Departments; all the majors now in the Pay Department except two; every lieutenant-colonel and major now in the Corps of Engineers and in the Ordnance Department; every officer now in the Signal Corps; all the majors but one now in the cavalry; all the majors but two now in the artillery; and all majors now in the infantry. In short, he ranked many of the lieutenant-colonels and every major except five now in the Army outside of the Subsistence Department. Had he remained in the infantry he would before now have been a lieutenant-colonel by regular promotion.

As captain commissary of subsistence, February 9, 1863, Captain Cushing ranked every major now in the Adjutant-General's Department, every lieutenant-colonel and major in the Inspector-General's Department, and every officer now in the Judge-Advocate-General's Department. He ranked three of the lieutenant-colonels and all the majors but one now in the Quartermaster's Department, every major now in the Medical Department, and every major now in the Pay Department except three. He ranked every lieutenant-colonel and major now in the Corps of Engineers, every lieutenant-colonel and major now in the Ordnance Department, and every officer now in the Signal Corps.

He ranked every major now in the cavalry except three, every major now in the artillery except four, and every major now in the infantry. In other words, under his present commission as captain commissary of subsistence he ranked many of the lieutenant-colonels and all but eleven of the majors now in the service outside of the Subsistence Department. He has been a captain nearly twenty-six years, a captain in the Subsistence Department nearly twenty-five years, and for the past three years has been senior captain in the Army. His length of continuous service as a commissioned officer exceeds that of two hundred of the majors now in service, and in his present grade of captain he has seen more than two hundred officers who were his juniors both in relative rank and length of service promoted to the grade of major.

To show that the slow promotion in this department (unparalleled in any other department or branch of the Army) is not confined to the three officers above named, take the cases of the three majors in the Subsistence Department next below Major Morgan. They are: J. P. Hawkins, M. P. Small, and T. C. Sullivan. They were appointed commissaries of subsistence on the same day as Major Morgan, namely, August 3, 1861. They have each served over twenty-six years in the department, and as commissioned officers respectively thirty-five, thirty-two, and thirty-one and one-half years.

The length of continuous commissioned service of Majors Small and Sullivan exceeds that of two-thirds of the lieutenant-colonels of the Army, and that of Major Hawkins exceeds that of all but three of the lieutenant-colonels now in the Army outside the Subsistence Department.

Take also the cases of the three captains in the Subsistence Department next below Captain Cushing. They are: W. A. Elderkin, C. B. Penrose, and W. H. Nash.

Captain Elderkin entered the service as a lieutenant of artillery May 6, 1861; was appointed captain commissary of subsistance July 4, 1864; and, next to Captain Cushing, is the senior captain in the Army. He has served twenty-three and one-half years continuously in his present grade of captain, and has seen more than one hundred and eighty officers who were his juniors in that grade promoted to a higher one. He has served twenty-six and one-half years as a commissioned officer, a period exceeding that of more than one hundred and eighty majors now in service.

Captains Penrose and Nash entered the volunteer service August 3, 1861, and November 26, 1862, respectively, and were appointed captains in the Subsistence Department of the Army May 13 and November 17, 1865, respectively. Their length of service as commissioned officers (including volunteer service) is twenty-six and five-twelfths and twenty-five and one-twelfth years, respectively. In the regular Army, under their present commissions and in their present grades, they have, as captains, served, respectively, twenty-two and two-thirds and twenty-two and one-twelfth years, and ranked more than half the majors now in service.

Of the officers who entered the Army in the same year as Lieutenant-Colonel Beckwith, he is the only one now in service below the rank of colonel.

Of the officers who entered the Army the same year as Major Morgan, he is the only one now in service below the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

Of the officers who entered the Army the same year as Captain Cushing, he is the only one now in service below the rank of major.

All the officers named herein have served more than twenty-five years, most of them more than thirty years, and two of them over thirty-five years; but only one of them has been advanced beyond the grade of major, four of them are still captains, and one has remained a captain more than a quarter of a century.

In the second session of the Forty-ninth Congress I had the honor to introduce a bill for the rearrangement of the grades and the increase of the efficiency of the Adjutant-General's Department. At that time Congress was strongly urged to enact the same provisions which are recited in the bill I have just read. It was suggested, however, that to insist upon this might jeopardize the passage of the bill for the improvement of the Adjutant-General's Department.

The officers of the Subsistence Department, who were in the city, very generously urged that, rather than endanger the measure for the benefit of their brother officers, the proposed amendment by which they were to profit should be withheld.

To my personal knowledge it was determined by high officials and by members of both Houses of Congress that efforts should be made to do justice to the officers of the Commissary Department during this session.

On December 22, General Macfeely, who is soon to be retired, and who certainly has no object in view except the efficiency of the Army, addressed a letter to General Sheridan, which I will read:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE COMMISSARY-GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
Washington, D. C., December 22, 1887.

GENERAL: I have the honor to inclose herewith the draught of a bill to effect a rearrangement of grades of office in the Subsistence Department of the Army, which it is proposed, with your approval, to submit to the Military Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The proposed change has been carefully considered, and I believe it to be necessary for the best interests of the service. It is in exact keeping with the most recent changes in the organizations of the other staff departments made to meet the necessities of the service, and would greatly increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department by giving it the organization required by the established system of military divisions, departments, and depots.

Unfortunately, when the other staff departments and the line of the Army were increased in 1866, no change was made in the Subsistence Department, the then Commissary-General being opposed to it, in the belief that the Army and the number of divisions and departments would soon be reduced, and any increase then made would be only temporary. Time has shown that this belief was erroneous. As well stated by the Adjutant-General, referring to the number of divisions and departments, in his letter of January last, submitting the draught of a bill, similar to this, for the reorganization of his department—

"The wisdom of the present territorial division of the country has been fully demonstrated by more than twenty years' experience, and leads to the conclusion that any departure from this system must be remote. In view of this, the underlying reason for the desired organization becomes apparent."

Besides the principal purchasing depots, involving great responsibility, and requiring officers of rank and experience, there are three military divisions and six military departments, each of which requires an officer of the Subsistence Department as chief commissary. There are not in the department, as at present organized, enough officers above the rank of captain to fill these positions. As a consequence, four captains are performing duty as chief commissaries, while, on the same staffs, the representatives of other departments have higher rank, often to the extent of two grades.

With the rearrangement of grades provided for in the proposed bill, the department, with the same number of officers as at present, would have a colonel for each military division, and a lieutenant-colonel or major for each department and principal purchasing depot.

For the efficiency of an army, a well-organized commissariat is second in importance to no other branch of army administration, and the duties of the officers of this department, whether at military headquarters or at large purchasing depots, demand ability, experience, and unremitting careful attention.

As chief commissaries of divisions and departments, they must have thorough knowledge of the details and customs of service, of the wants and necessities of troops, of the resources of the country, and of the laws and regulations relative to the procurement and distribution of army supplies. Not only are they, equally with officers of the general staff, responsible to the commanding general for the efficient service of their department within his command, but they are also, as disbursing officers, pecuniarily responsible that their acts are in accordance with law and regulations. Their rank evidently should be commensurate to the importance of their duties, and not inferior to that held by officers of other staff departments performing duties of like responsibility.

The impropriety and injustice of requiring officers of one department to serve with so much less rank than that of others, whose duties are no more important, will be manifest to any one who has ever served as an officer. The hardship to officers of this department will be still more apparent when their length of service is considered in comparison with that of those of the same rank in other branches of the service. It comes directly from the defective grading of its officers, which has caused in the department an extreme and unparalleled stagnation of promotion. To show clearly the extent of this a statement setting forth facts in detail is inclosed herewith, to which attention is specially invited.

I will merely add here that since 1865 only one officer besides myself has advanced more than one grade in the Subsistence Department, and that five of them are still serving in the same grade they held the year the war closed. Of the majors who would be promoted, should the proposed bill become a law, all have served continuously over thirty years, and of the captains who would be promoted all have served over twenty-five years, one of them in the same grade nearly twenty-six years. All officers now in the department, except the two junior captains, served in the Army during the war; one-half of them were officers in the Army before the war; and three-fourths of them are still serving in the grades of major and captain.

It is not too much to say that no officers in service have worked more intelligently, zealously, and faithfully than the officers of this department, although feeling keenly the fact that they were receiving less promotion than any other class of officers in the Army.

As the proposed measure will not increase the number of officers in the department, but will correct existing defects in its organization, do justice to most deserving men without injury or injustice to any one, and is in the line of improving the military service, I ask for it your favorable consideration and action.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. MACFEELY,
Commissary-General Subsistence.

Lieutenant-General P. H. SHERIDAN,
Commanding the Army.

This letter was forwarded by General Sheridan to the Secretary of War, with a letter of his own which I will read.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY, Washington, December 27, 1887.

SIR: I forward herewith a draught of an act to effect a rearrangement of grades in the Subsistence Department of the Army.

The officers of the Subsistence Department have suffered much loss of rank from faulty organization of their corps, and the proposed bill is intended to remedy this, by giving promotion to the intermediate grades.

The corps has not now a basis which gives its officers rank equivalent with others, as will be seen by reading the accompanying letter and papers from the Commissary-General, and this being the case, it is unnecessary for me to say that the promotion of men who have stood in one grade for so many years, as is here shown, would benefit the service. I therefore commend the proposed bill to your consideration, and respectfully ask its transmission to Congress in the hope that the Subsistence Department may be given an organization similar in scope with the other staff departments of the Army.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

So impressed was the Secretary of War by the views of General Sheridan and General Macfeely as to the desirability if not absolute necessity of the improvement of this department contemplated in the proposed legislation, that he transmitted the letters to the President with a communication from himself, which I will read:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 7, 1888.

SIR: In accordance with the recommendation of the Lieutenant-General of the Army, contained in his inclosed letter of the 27th ultimo, I have the honor to transmit a letter, dated the 22d ultimo, from the Commissary-General of Subsistence, together with a draught of a proposed bill to effect a rearrangement of the grades of office in the Subsistence Department of the Army.

The action proposed is similar to that asked by the Adjutant-General for the department of which he is the head, and granted by Congress at its last session; and I trust that Congress will be pleased to consider this request favorably, having (as it has) in view the promotion of men who, as the record shows, are well entitled thereto by long and faithful service. Its object is, as the Commissary-General shows, the placing of a department whose services are most important to the well-being of the whole Army in a state of proper efficiency.

In view of the statements made by the Commissary-General of Subsistence, and the approval of the Lieutenant-General commanding the Army, I beg the favorable and speedy consideration of the committee for this matter.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore United States Senate.

I may be in error, Mr. Speaker, but it seems to me that the House of Representatives ought to consider well before they assume the responsibility of disregarding in toto the recommendations of such prominent and distinguished officials. Even if our attention had not been called to the condition of the Commissary-General's Department by these letters, I am inclined to think that the information we derive from the Army Register would of itself suffice to convince us of the necessity of such legislation as is suggested to us in these official documents. The Senate certainly took this view of the subject, and a few days since they passed a bill (S. 1248), which is identical in language with the bill introduced by myself on January 9, and that bill has been transmitted to this House for our consideration.

During the last twenty-three years our country has doubled in population, and possibly more than doubled in wealth and production. Our railroads have quadrupled in mileage, and I might add, in general efficiency and cheapness of transportation.

Development has been marvelous, legislation has been invoked and has kept pace with the wonderful strides in every civil vocation, and during all this time Congress has turned a deaf ear to recommendations indispensable to efficiency and economy in army administration. The general and head of this Department, the General-in-Chief of the Army, and the Secretary of War now tell us that the change they recommend is essential to place the officers of this department on a proper footing and to correct the defects in its present faulty organization.

The changed conditions of the country requires officers of fixed grades for certain duties, and we are plainly informed that efficiency can not be attained if legislation is allowed to stand which discriminates against the officers of one department. It is this adverse discrimination, of which the Subsistence Department has so long been the victim, which these distinguished officials now ask Congress to rectify.

If the law they recommend had been enacted at the time some of the other corps were reorganized, several of the captains of the Subsistence Corps would now be majors of twenty years' standing, and therefore would be eligible for promotion to the grade of lieutenant-colonel under the bill reported by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], and which we all agree is very good indeed, and, if supplemented by the bill which I have read, will go very far toward the establishment of equality and harmony.

My object in making these remarks is to call the attention of the House to that bill, and also to endeavor to show that the bill now under consideration does not meet the requirements of the service which were manifestly in the minds of the Secretary of War, General Sheridan, and General Macfeely when they wrote the letters I have read.

The bill now before the House does not make any permanent change in the organization of any part of the Army. Its only effect upon the Subsistence Department will be to give temporary relief to one major and four captains, but will utterly fail to give that department the more perfect organization which is so earnestly urged upon Congress.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when all needed and proper changes should be made in Army organization, and I believe that intelligent action of this character will secure much more economical administration and at the same time greatly increase the efficiency of the Army. Experience in the vast armies of Europe has demonstrated the fact that efficient organization always tends to the diminution of expense, and careful examination has convinced me that by pursuing the same course in our Army we can achieve the same results.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I desire to emphasize the fact that the bill which I introduced and the similar bill which passed the Senate by a unanimous vote makes no addition whatever to the Army and is very much more economical than the bill which has been reported as a substitute. I have great respect for each and all the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and feel certain they will give kind and careful consideration to these remarks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN B. READ.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the floor to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution S. R. 5, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to organize a board of officers, as stipulated in said Read's written contract with the War Department in 1856, such board to consist of not less than three officers, selecting the same from the ordnance and artillery arms of the United States service, who will examine all facts relative to the claim and patent of said Read, and ascertain whether the United States have made any use of any invention or discovery of said Read in projectiles; whether the same, if so used, were used under any contract, expressed or implied; whether he consented to the use of said projectiles by the Confederate government against the United States, or received any compensation therefor, and whether this invention was used by the United States; to what extent, if any, his invention or discovery was used, and whether such use was valuable, and whether such contract itself was advantageous to the United States; and if so, what sum, if any, under the circumstances of the use, the United States ought in justice to pay for the same. And that such board do make their report on the above case and claim, with all convenient speed, to the Secretary of War, to be by him transmitted to Congress for its action in the premises; and that such report be accompanied by a statement of all the proofs submitted to and considered by said board.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. FORD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (S. R. 5) in relation to the claim of John B. Read, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

In 1856 Dr. Read invented and patented a projectile for rifled ordnance. In the opinion of the committee he was the first to discover and demonstrate the feasibility of using hard metals for smooth expanding sabots of rifled projectiles, thereby forcing the sabot of the projectile into the grooves of the gun, thus giving that great degree of efficiency for which modern rifled ordnance is renowned.

Upon investigating Dr. Read's invention, the Secretary of War, on the 28th day of July, 1856, entered into a contract with Dr. Read, by which Read undertook and did assign to the United States the right to "forever use for all governmental purposes the improvements, inventions, and suggestions covered by" the patent of Read, "should they be deemed worthy of adoption," the consideration for which use, as stated in the contract, was to be "such compensation as may be awarded by the Secretary of War, upon the report of a board of Army officers to be designated by him."

Under this contract the United States proceeded to use the inventions of Read, and continued such use during the war of the rebellion, and are to-day using the smooth, cylindrical sabots driven into the grooves of the gun.

The joint resolution seeks to carry out the contract entered into in 1856, by authorizing the Secretary of War to appoint a board of officers, who shall investigate the whole subject-matter and report to Congress their conclusions.

A similar resolution was passed by the Forty-ninth Congress, but did not reach the President in time to receive his approval.

The committee recommend that the resolution do pass, and that House resolution No. 5 do lie upon the table.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I will say just a few words. This joint resolution is carefully guarded at every point. It only proposes to pay this inventor what the Government, as far back as 1856, agreed to pay him if, after thorough investigation by a board of officers appointed by the Secretary of War, anything should be found due him; and unless some gentleman wishes to ask some questions about it, I have nothing further to say.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TILLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROADS TO THE PRESIDIO, SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. [6098, and that it be considered the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction and repair of the roads and walks leading to the United States national cemetery on the reservation of the Presidio of San Francisco, planting trees and shrubs, and for the protection and fencing of the said roads and reservation in which the cemetery is situated, and also for the preservation of the same and its springs of water used for irrigating the post and cemetery from drifting sand, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That whenever called upon by the proper military authorities, the city of San Francisco shall be permitted to send any part of its police force to arrest trespassers, intruders, and disorderly persons upon said reservation.

The report (by Mr. LAIRD) was read, as follows:

Your committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6098) authorizing the construction and repair of the roads from the entrance to the reservation of the Presidio at San Francisco, Cal., to the national cemetery on the same, and the fencing and protection of the said reservation and the cemetery thereon, respectfully submit that it appears from the examination of the annexed report of the Secretary of War, the General of the Army, and the Quartermaster-General, that the money asked for in the accompanying bill is needed for immediate use in the preservation and protection of public property and in the construction and completion of roads through the United States military reservation at San Francisco, Cal.

The Presidio comprises something over 1,500 acres of land, worth several millions of dollars, and is necessary to the defense of the port of San Francisco, and the roads proposed to be constructed will be valuable for military purposes. The amount of work proposed to be done with the money asked is so agregately large in proportion to the appropriation asked that your committee take pleasure in recommending the passage of the bill, making the statements of the officers above referred to, and where the reasons for the expenditure are set out in detail, a part of their report.

One portion of the bill attracts the attention of your committee, namely, the proviso commencing in line 13, and providing for the arrest of trespassers, intruders, and disorderly persons upon the reservation by the police authorities of the city of San Francisco. It strikes your committee as worthy of remark that it is necessary to use civil officers to guard an army and the property belonging to it.

"WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, February 20, 1888.

"SIR: In reply to your request of the 7th instant for the views of this Department upon House bill 6098, Fiftieth Congress, first session, to appropriate $10,000 for the construction and repair of the roads leading to the national cemetery on the reservation of the Presidio of San Francisco, and the fencing and protection of the reservation and the cemetery thereon, I have the honor to invite attention to the inclosed report of the 14th instant, accompanied by a map of the Presidio reservation, from the Quartermaster-General, stating that the cemetery needs considerable enlargement, that the roads leading to it require extensive repairs, and that in view of the importance of the Presidio reservation as a defensive position the sum proposed to be appropriated is not too large.

"I also invite attention to the inclosed report of the 17th instant from the Lieutenant-General, who states that the reservation is of much value to the Government, but for lack of funds has not been kept in proper police and repair, and that the concluding provision of the bill is necessary owing to the proximity of the reservation to the city of San Francisco.

"The views of the Quartermaster-General and of the Lieutenant-General are concurred in by this Department.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
"Secretary of War.

"Hon. R. W. TOWNSHEND,
"Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives."

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
"Washington, D. C., February 17, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a bill (H. R. 6098, Fiftieth Congress, first session) for the construction of roads and fences at the Presidio at San Francisco, referred by you for my report, with the remark that I heartily approve of the proposed measure. This reservation is of much value to the Government, but for lack of funds has not been kept in proper police and repair. This amount, if appropriated, will put the grounds in good condition.

"The concluding proviso is also necessary, the reservation immediately adjoining the city of San Francisco and being often the resort of tramps and objectionable individuals.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"P. H. SHERIDAN,
"Lieutenant-General, Commanding.

"The SECRETARY OF WAR."

"WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., February 14, 1888.

"SIR: In regard to the House bill No. 6098, referred to me for report, I have the honor to state:

"1. That the national cemetery situated on the reservation of the Presidio of San Francisco is the only one within the States and Territories upon the Pacific slope. Consequently it needs enlarging considerably to meet all the requirements of existing law, namely, that the Government shall furnish a place of burial for every deceased soldier, sailor, or marine that served in the late war for the Union.

"2. The roads leading to this cemetery need extensive repairs, and require to be kept in repair. The water used for its irrigation and for the military posts on the reservation requires protection for its springs and conduits, both of materials and by the police. The movements of the sand-drifts across the reservation can be suppressed only by attention, such as claying and seed-planting.

"3. The Presidio reservation itself contains about 1,520 acres. It extends along the seashore and the coast line of the entrance at the Golden Gate, along a part of the bay, and has one side and part of another abutting against the streets and blocks of the city of San Francisco. This reservation is said to contain the main positions for the defensive works to bar the entrance through the Golden Gate to the San Francisco Harbor.

"Therefore upon its integrity in a great measure must depend the safety of the largest and best harbor on the Pacific coast. It is a landed estate of great value, estimated at many millions of dollars.

"It needs fences, gate-keepers, guards, and at times the assistance of the police to break up the camps of tramps, hoodlums, and unlawful persons within its limits.

"For the expenditure necessary for the cemetery, and incidentally for the reservation upon which it is situated, the sum named, $10,000, is not too large, and it is safe to say that no money in the Treasury can be more usefully applied than this.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"S. B. HOLABIRD,
"Quartermaster-General, United States Army.

"The SECRETARY OF WAR."

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, the report is so full and complete that unless some gentleman desires to ask a question, I move the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAIRD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL ALFRED PLEASONTON.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire General Pleasonton, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the laws regulating appointments in the Army be, and they are hereby, suspended, and suspended only for the purpose of this act; and the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Alfred Pleasonton, late a major-general of volunteers in the Army of the United States, a brevet major-general in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him, the said Alfred Pleasonton, upon the retired-list of the Army as such brigadier-general, without regard and in addition to the number now authorized by law of said retired-list.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommended the following amendment:

Strike out, in lines 11 and 12, the words "as such brigadier-general" and insert in lieu therefor the words "with the rank and grade of colonel," and insert the following proviso after the last line, namely:

"Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said Alfred Pleasonton; but this proviso shall be no bar to any claim for pension that the widow or children or heirs of the said Alfred Pleasonton may have after his decease."

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, the report on this bill is somewhat lengthy, but probably part of it, at least, had better be read by the Clerk, and if, during its progress, it should be the will of the committee, I will move that the reading be suspended. The report gives some idea of the military service rendered by General Pleasonton from the time he graduated from West Point, in 1844, serving almost immediately thereafter in the Mexican war with great distinction, and also in the more recent war. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report should be read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has indicated the character of the bill. The report is rather long, and as time is very precious, I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon having it read now.

Mr. HOLMAN. This matter has been before the House on a previous occasion, I believe, but I do not distinctly remember the facts, and I think that at least enough of the report should be read to indicate the character of the bill.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman who made the report be allowed to state its substance to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish particularly to know the circumstances under which General Pleasanton left the service.

Mr. LAIRD. General Pleasonton's services are a matter of history. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] must have knowledge of them.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, as is shown by this report, General Pleasonton entered the Military Academy at West Point in 1840, graduated in 1844, being at that time made a lieutenant in the Army—a second lieutenant, I think, and went almost immediately afterward into the Mexican war, which began in 1846. In that war he distinguished himself in more than one hotly-contested engagement, and was brevetted for gallantry on the field of battle. After the Mexican war he served for a number of years in that most difficult and thankless part of the military service of the country the service on the frontier, taking part in more than one Indian war, and acquitting himself at all times with distinguished gallantry and fidelity to the flag under which he drew his sword.

At the breaking out of the civil war between the States, General Pleasonton immediately went again into the field and rose with rapid distinction from one rank to another, until finally, when that war closed, he bore the rank of major-general of volunteers. All his comrades bear evidence to the fact that in every relation which he held in the Army his conduct was marked by distinguished ability and valor. On the floor of this House only a few years ago, when a proposition similar to the present was under consideration, that veteran of the Union Army, whom I had the pleasure of shaking by the hand here to-day—General Rosecrans—paid General Pleasonton the highest possible compliment, and all the other officers who served with him have given similar testimony.

I have been asked by the gentleman from Indiana what were the circumstances——

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to know under what circumstances General Pleasonton left the Army.

Mr. HOOKER. I will tell the gentleman in a moment; but first, in justice to General Pleasonton, let me say that when the late war broke out there was one branch of the service of the Union Army that had not been brought to the perfection that characterized its infantry and artillery corps. I refer to the cavalry. The cavalry of the Union Army had to meet the distinguished men of the Confederate forces, coming from that region of country where men were brought up on horseback, as it were, and were soldiers from boyhood.

The cavalry forces of the Union had to encounter the distinguished cavalry leaders of Virginia—that portion of the country to which we are accustomed to look when we want to see statesmen and soldiers; and those of us who have ever stood upon her beautiful valleys and gazed upon her lofty mountains, sometimes lustrous with sunshine, sometimes covered with shadow, and sometimes the home of the storm god, have ceased to wonder that that country should breed heroes amongst its men and heroines amongst its women. To meet soldiers led by men from that country, General Pleasonton was called upon to organize the cavalry forces of the United States. He did organize them with distinguished ability; he led them with equally distinguished valor; and probably by breaking the line of the opposing forces he paved the way for the successes which finally crowned the Union flag when, at Appomattox and in North Carolina, the soldiers of the Confederacy laid down their arms.

No man in the Union Army, according to the testimony of his comrades, bore himself with more distinction than General Pleasonton. Yet, after all his services, rendered in the Mexican war and in the civil war, he found himself, when the latter conflict closed, still in the Army with no greater rank than that with which he had entered it. Consequently, when he found others promoted over him and felt that he had not been dealt with justly in that regard, he resigned his position. But, like all other officers, so far as I know, educated at West Point, he was not fit for any duties but those of a soldier.

He is now an old man. His early life, the prime of his manhood, and his ripened and more mature years having been given to his country, it is but justice he should now be retired. The bill, as originally introduced by my friend from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], proposed to retire

General Pleasonton as a brigadier-general. I believe he ought to be so retired, and I would have voted in favor of the measure in that form. But it was the judgment and will of the committee that he should be retired with only the rank and pay of a colonel. This is a tardy act of justice, Mr. Speaker, and I hope it will now be performed with a unanimity which shall be some compensation to this gallant old soldier for the delay in the discharge of this debt which the country owes him. [Applause.] [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The first amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 11, the words "as such brigadier-general" and insert "with the rank and grade of colonel."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said Alfred Pleasonton, but this proviso shall be no bar to any claim for pension that the widow or children or heirs of the said Alfred Pleasonton may have after his decease.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the title of the bill be amended so as to conform to the body of the bill as it now stands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that amendment will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MUSTER AND PAY OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I call up House bill 1560, to extend the provisions of "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," and move that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of "An act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces," approved June 4, 1884, as amended by the act approved February 3, 1887, be, and the same are hereby, extended for a period of three years from the 3d day of June, 1887.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

After the word "hereby" insert "revived and," and strike out the word "three" and insert "five;" so it will read:

And the same are hereby revived and extended for a period of five years from the 3d day of June, 1887.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] be permitted to make a statement explanatory of the bill, instead of having the report read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to that.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, by the act of June 4, 1884, it was provided that officers in the volunteer service should be considered as mustered into their respective rank and grade from the date of the actual issue of their commission by competent authority.

By the act amendatory thereof, which became a law February 3, 1887, it was provided that—

Any person who was duly appointed and commissioned, whether his commission was actually received by him or not, shall be considered as commissioned to the grade therein named from the date when his commission was actually issued by competent authority, and shall be entitled to all pay and emoluments as if actually mustered at that date.

The act of June 3, 1884, contained the following limitation:

SEC. 3. That all claims arising under this act shall be presented to and filed in the proper department within three years from and after the passage hereof, and all such claims not so presented and filed within said three years shall be forever barred and no allowance ever made thereon.

The act of February 3, 1887, was an amendment of section 1 of the act of June 3, 1884. It was held by the War Department that the limitation in the third section applied to the new act of February 3 as well as to the original act. By this construction it happened that the amended act was only in force from February 3 to June 3, 1887, a period of only four months, and so, before those intended to be benefited by the provisions of the act generally became aware of its existence, it was held to have expired, and the act failed to accomplish the justice designed.

I do not think it was ever designed by Congress to have so brief an existence. If it was right to enact the law, it was right that those to be benefited should have a reasonable length of time to become aware of their rights and prepare and file their claims.

The committee unanimously recommended this period be extended. The whole number of claims reported by the Secretary of the Treasury under this act of February 3, 1887, was 3,723. The number doubtless will be small and the amount will be small. It is an act of justice for services actually rendered.

The amendments were adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to this amendment; but, on the contrary, it seems to be a proper measure.

I observe the limitation imposed on the presentation of claims of soldiers during the late war has produced a great many instances of hardship. It seems to me that the limitation should be opened up for at least one year more, and I therefore propose an additional section, providing it shall be suspended for a period of one year from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. STEELE. Make it three years.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I see no objection to the adoption of that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the limitation heretofore imposed by law on the presentation of claims for the loss of horses and equipments by officers and soldiers in the military service during the late war is hereby suspended for the period of three years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the title of the bill by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAJ. MICHAEL P. SMALL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH].

Mr. MAISH. I move that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 542) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small, and that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid to Maj. Michael P. Small, a commissary of subsistence in the United States Army, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,783.87, being the amount of Government funds stolen or embezzled from him without his default at Chicago, Ill., in the years 1879 and 1880, and which was restored by him out of private funds.

The report (by Mr. CUTCHEON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 542) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small, have considered the same and make the following report:

A bill having the same object as the present was reported favorably in both Houses of Congress in the Forty-ninth Congress, but was not reached for final action.

Since that time there has been some change in the status of affairs, by the payment by Major Small of the amount embezzled by his clerk to the Government out of his private funds. The present bill authorizes the repayment to him of the amount so exacted from him, $3,783.87. With this statement of this change of aspect the committee adopts the report made from this committee in the Forty-ninth Congress, as follows:

"[House Report No. 1150, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Military Affairs to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4616) for the relief of Maj. Michael P. Small, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

"The object of the bill is to relieve Maj. Michael P. Small from a charge of $3,780.63, standing against him on the books of the Treasury.

"The major, when stationed at Chicago in November, 1880, as purchasing and depot commissary, was robbed by his clerk, a Mr. George Davidson, of the above sum. The United States, by its attorney in the southern district of New York, brought its action against Davidson for the recovery of the amount stolen by him, and obtained judgment for the full amount. In its petition it is expressly alleged that the fraud was perpetrated by Davidson by interpolating in the abstract of purchase a false entry without the knowledge or consent of Major Small, and all the proof in the case acquits him of any dishonorable intent, while his memorial is full of the strongest testimonials from officers of the highest rank in the Army as to his intelligence, vigilance, and efficiency.

"The facts in the case are these: Davidson, while acting as confidential clerk of the major, in whose employ he had been in the same capacity for ten years, with the aid of a confederate in the office, who had been the trusted clerk of the present Commissary-General when he was acting as purchasing commissary at Chicago, managed to interpolate in a genuine voucher a false entry of a purchase of 7,200 5-pound packages of dried apples, for the purpose of covering up petty larcenies, which amounted to the value of the apples—say $3,600. This voucher was transmitted to Washington, but there was no such entry on the retained copy held by the major.

"Subsequently, on his purchasing 1,187 pounds of dried apples and accounting for the same at Washington, he was asked why he made such a purchase when his return of provisions indicated that he had on hand 7,197 pounds. Packages in the mean time had been changed into pounds, and a credit of 3 pounds of apples from an old account reduced the number of pounds from the corresponding number of packages, to wit, 7,200, to 7,197, as above stated. This question put the major on inquiry, however, and the result of his investigation was the disclosure which has already been mentioned.

"The clerk made a full confession of the details of the embezzlement. Judgment was obtained against him for the amount stolen, and he was placed under arrest. In the mean time the accounting officers of the Treasury held the major responsible for the sum mentioned in the bill. It should be added that there were one or two other small defalcations concealed by forged vouchers, which bring the sum up to $3,780.63, instead of $3,600, the amount taken, to cover up which the apple entry was invented.

"The committee have carefully examined the facts of this case, and are inclined to adopt the opinion of the judge-advocate who assisted the United States district attorney in the prosecution of the suit, that the fraud perpetrated was ingeniously contrived and likely to deceive any one. At all events, they are very clearly of the opinion that Major Small is equitably entitled to the relief for which he asks, and they recommend, therefore, that the bill do pass."

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make this suggestion to the gentleman in charge of the bill: It does not appear from the face of this report whether the clerk was appointed by the officer who is the claimant in this case or not. I think a different rule has prevailed generally where the appointment in such cases was made not by the officer sustaining the loss, but without any control upon his part.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. MAISH. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask, first, whether—as it does not appear from the report—this clerk was arrested, or whether he was prosecuted at all for the embezzlement?

Mr. CUTCHEON. He was convicted and died in prison.

Mr. MAISH. He was convicted and sentenced.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not so stated in the report.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that the Committee on Military Affairs, who have prepared this report, made a thorough investigation of the matter not only during the present session of Congress, but with somewhat of the same care in the last Congress. The body of the present report was prepared by Hon. J. D. Findlay, from Baltimore, who was then a member of the Committee on Military Affairs; and, as the House will recollect, he was an able lawyer, and this matter was thoroughly and carefully investigated by him. A favorable report in both branches of Congress was made, but it was not reached for final action.

The action of the military authorities, of General Sheridan, upon whose staff he was, and other officers connected with the War Department, show that Major Smalls has been always regarded as not culpable in any degree for this loss, nor in any manner accountable, for the reason that the forgery or interpolation specified in the report was made in this voucher after his signature had been appended, made by his confidential clerk, and the first intimation he had of the interpolation was when his attention was called to the matter by the Commissary Department in Washington, as is fully explained in the report. It was discovered in this manner:

Subsequently to the date of this interpolation, of which he was innocent and ignorant, he filed a voucher for the purchase of a supply of dried apples, amongst other commissary stores, in the Department here, when his attention was called to the fact that but a very short time before he had filed a voucher for 7,200 packages, which was the first information he had of the fact; and by this means he discovered the forgery, for a prompt investigation showed that the original voucher had been changed after he had signed it. Upon the discovery of the forgery he did all that could be done to bring the offenders to justice. Davidson, the clerk, was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced, and died in prison.

I repeat, that the authorities never held Major Smalls in any manner liable, as is apparent from the fact that he is still in the service and is disbursing officer at Baltimore, and has never been disturbed in any manner in his official position. The accounting officers of the Treasury finally brought suit, and he paid the whole amount out of his private means. I do not think that any person who has ever investigated the matter has been able to say that Major Smalls was responsible in the slightest degree for this loss.

Mr. STEELE. Allow me to interrupt my colleague on the committee to state that I do not think the Department brought suit against him, but the amount was withheld from his pay.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The gentleman is correct in that; it was stopped out of his pay.

Mr. CASWELL. Whose appointee was this clerk?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am not able to state, but I think he was a public-service official detailed for that duty, and was not appointed by Major Smalls.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I remember that some years back, as early as 1864, up to which period Congress had held public officers to a very close and strict accountability for the custody of public funds, the question arose with reference to relieving an officer for a defalcation which had occurred in the mint at Denver, amounting to some several thousand dollars. The clerk, in that instance, had been appointed by the Treasury Department; and after a very tedious consideration of that case, occupying several sessions of Congress, it was held that inasmuch as this officer was not responsible for the appointment of the clerk, he being appointed by the Treasury Department, and was not authorized to take a bond from him, that it was a proper case for relief. As far as my knowledge extends, that is the first instance where a public officer was granted relief for the embezzlement of public funds in his charge. The practice of Congress before that had been exceedingly strict and severe; as much so, in fact, as in any of our States.

Since then I do not understand that as a rule, liberal as we have gotten to be in regard to relieving public officers for the loss of public funds resulting by their own neglect or carelessness, that liberality goes to the extent of relieving an officer from loss where he might have protected himself against the loss, as in the case where he appoints his own clerk, and may impose upon him the same conditions that are usually imposed upon persons in civil life who are placed in a position where they have control or custody of the funds of others.

I do not purpose to oppose this bill; but I suggest simply to my friend from Michigan that we are adopting a loose practice in regard to the liability of public officers by granting relief in almost all cases that come before Congress for action.

Mr. WHEELER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me a moment, I think the gentleman from Indiana is mistaken in regard to the decisions and rulings on questions of this character. The Court of Claims has decided in a number of cases——

Mr. HOLMAN. I was not speaking of the action of the Court of Claims, but of the line of policy adopted with regard to such cases by Congress.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Court of Claims is a very safe guide and precedent for us in the consideration of such cases; and I recollect in examining some of the decisions of that court, several cases of that character—amongst them the Glenn case, the Whittlesey case, the Christian case, the Reynolds case, and several others where the court did not take the strict view suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, but held that where an officer had shown that he had taken all proper precautions, such as men take in the ordinary business transactions of life, it was fit and proper to give consideration to applications for relief.

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, I trust that no such proposition as that has been laid down by any court. Ordinary care upon the part of a public officer intrusted with money—whether the officer be civil or military—would not be such care as should be taken to entitle him to relief. Such custody of public funds points to a much higher degree of care and responsibility than that suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER. I fully concur with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the greatest care should be exacted from all officials, and I think the report in this case shows that every care was exercised which could reasonably have been expected; but I was referring to rules laid down by the courts.

I will not, however, occupy time, because it seems the House is prepared to pass the bill. I shall therefore withhold any further remarks which I might otherwise have been disposed to make.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MAISH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TELEGRAPH OPERATORS DURING THE WAR.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield now to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. GEAR. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8003) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war; and I ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas, except commissioned officers, those persons engaged in the military telegraph corps of the United States during the war of the rebellion, although performing strictly military duties, whereby some lost their lives and others were wounded or imprisoned, have received no official recognition for their fidelity, intelligence, bravery, and efficiency; and

Whereas, as an integral part of the Army, they ought to have been accorded a military status corresponding in rank to the service so meritoriously performed; and

Whereas, by reason of the death of many Army telegraphers, and other difficulties developed by the lapse of time, it is at this time inexpedient to confer actual military rank upon members of said corps: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons engaged in the operation and construction of military telegraph lines during the war of the rebellion are hereby declared to have been a part of the military telegraph corps of the Army of the United States; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to prepare a roll of such persons, and to issue to each, upon application, unless it appears that his service was not creditably performed, a suitable certificate of honorable service in the military telegraph corps of the Army of the United States, reciting this act and the term and character of his service, as well as the relative rank of such person assimilated to that conferred by law upon commissioned officers of the Army receiving a monthly pay most nearly approximating that of such person at the time of his discharge: Provided, That this law shall not be construed to entitle the persons herein mentioned to any pay, allowance, bounty, or pension other than that heretofore received by them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Will the gentleman from Iowa state how much money is involved in this bill?

Mr. GEAR. The report is somewhat lengthy and I can give a brief explanation. This corps consisted of about 1,200 operators.

Mr. WARNER. The gentleman from Mississippi asked how much this bill will cost.

Mr. GEAR. It will not cost a cent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I object.

Mr. GEAR. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection till I can explain the bill.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I do not think anybody is informed how much money it will cost.

Mr. GEAR. The bill itself provides that it shall not cost a cent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and objection is made to its being considered in the House.

Mr. GEAR. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8003) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that as the bill has just been read in the House the reading of it in committee be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was a little confusion when the first part of the bill was being read. I prefer to have the bill read again, or at least the first portion of it.

The bill was again read.

Mr. GEAR. I will not occupy more than a moment in giving a brief explanation of the bill. There were some twelve hundred men of that class in the service who have never been recognized officially except a few officers. Of those twelve hundred men two hundred died from wounds; another one hundred died from other casualties; making 25 per cent. of the number who died in the service. These men come to Congress and ask the recognition of an honorable certificate of service.

Mr. LYMAN. Does the bill take a cent from the Treasury?

Mr. GEAR. Not a penny.

Mr. RYAN. The only effect is to give a certificate of honorable discharge?

Mr. GEAR. That is all.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Does any patriotic citizen object? None.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the committee will consider that a new field is being opened up by this bill. The telegraph operators of course rendered valuable service during the war period. But on the other hand they were only civilians; they were not enrolled in the Army; they were not a part of the Army.

There was a very large body of civilians who occupied the same kind of relation to the public service as they occupied; the clerks of paymasters, of commissaries, of quartermasters, teamsters, a large body of men who were not recognized as part of the Army and yet were employed in connection with its operations.

I think it is easy to perceive that if Congress shall lay down a proposition in the form of a law declaring that these persons were in some sense connected with the military service, and were entitled to an honorable discharge, it, of course, implies their enlistment in the service. And that will not be the end of our legislation on the subject and ought not to be the end of it. If these gentlemen are entitled, any of the classes I have mentioned of civilians are entitled to be treated as having been of the Army, and entitled to a discharge from the Army——

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me finish my sentence. Then I submit that we should go further than that, and instead of now making the distinction we draw by this bill we should either not legislate for this class or treat all alike. I yield now to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that this bill does not even propose to give these persons an honorable discharge from the Army. It proposes simply to give them a certificate of their service in the military telegraph corps if they were found to have performed honorable service. That is all. It does not even recognize them as a part of the Army. It simply gives them a certificate of discharge as a part of the military telegraph corps, provided their service was honorably rendered.

Mr. LAFFOON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not at this moment. Will my friend tell me why the distinction should be made in favor of a particular class? Why not embrace all civilians who were in a quasi or partial sense connected with the Army? Why discriminate in favor of a particular class?

Mr. GEAR. Let me suggest that these men were in the advance. They were subject to military duty. Many of them were thrown into prison and suffered as great hardships as any that carried guns.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not that true also of the others who were connected with the Army? Why discriminate in favor of a particular class? I admit they were of the most intelligent class connected with the Army who were not of the Army proper. But the clerks ought not to be omitted. Their services were just as great.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that he let this bill go through and afterwards bring in other legislation for those other persons of whom he speaks.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would be the easiest way of course. [Laughter.]

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. Yes; that is it.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether its provisions are limited to the number of operators he has mentioned.

Mr. GEAR. So I understand. The report from the War Department, which accompanies the bill, states that there were about 1,200 men in that service, and the bill is limited to that class.

Mr. MACDONALD. But is there anything in it which limits its provisions to telegraph operators who were serving at the front?

Mr. GEAR. It is limited exclusively to telegraph operators in the military service of the Government. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to move to amend the bill, if the gentleman will permit, by inserting these words: "And others engaged in a civil capacity in connection with the operations of the Army."

Mr. GEAR. I hope that amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why not?

Mr. GEAR. Simply for the reason that we do not know how far-reaching it may be. These men were a special class who rendered a special service and who simply ask a certificate of that service.

Mr. LAFFOON. Can the gentleman tell us what benefit such a certificate will be to them?

Mr. GEAR. What benefit? I can illustrate the benefit by the case of a gentleman who lives in my own town. In that town there is a man who is to-day the superintendent of the Western Union telegraph service for one or two States. He was in a Southern prison during the war. He was offered a position among our friends at the South if he would abandon his Government; but rather than do so he lay in prison until he nearly died. That man desires a certificate showing that he rendered honorable service to the Government.

Mr. LAFFOON. But what benefit will it be to him now?

Mr. GEAR. It will show that he served his Government faithfully.

Mr. LAFFOON. Just an empty honor.

Mr. GEAR. Empty to you, perhaps, but not to him who rendered the service. I yield now to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, the question is asked: What does this bill confer? It may be answered: Nothing. It confers simply a certificate upon these men that they rendered honorable service to the Government of the United States in the military telegraph corps. It is expressly provided in the bill that there shall be no pecuniary emoluments of any kind. It simply puts in their hands a paper certificate of their service to their Government. That is all. The bill when it came to the committee provided for more than that, but we thought it was wiser to go to that extent and no further. I can see no possible objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. GEAR. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the second and third clauses of the preamble and part of the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth lines. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment, as I have indicated it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words, "Whereas, as an integral part of the Army they ought to have been appointed to a military status corresponding in rank to the service so meritoriously performed; and whereas, by reason of the deaths of many army telegraphers, and other difficulties developed by the lapse of time, it is at this time inexpedient to confer actual military rank upon members of said corps: Therefore."

Also amend by striking out, after the word "service," in the twelfth line, the following:

"As well as the relative rank of such person assimilated to that conferred by law upon commissioned officers of the Army receiving a monthly pay most nearly approximating that of such person at the time of his discharge."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I also move to strike out, in the fourth, fifth, and sixth lines, the words, "are hereby declared to have been a part of the military telegraph corps of the Army of the United States," and to insert in lieu thereof the following: "shall be entered upon a roll to be kept in the War Department;" so that it will read:

That all persons engaged in the operation and construction of the military telegraph lines during the war shall be entered upon a roll to be kept in the War Department.

Mr. CARUTH. That the persons shall be entered, or their names?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Their names. I accept the amendment of my friend the critic from Louisville. [Laughter.] The object of this amendment is that a certificate, if it is desired, shall be granted to each of these persons, but that they shall not be declared a part of the Army of the United States, nor receive a certificate that shall be in the nature of a commission. As the bill is drawn, these persons are made a part of the Army of the United States. They constitute the military telegraph corps, and it is declared that they ought to have received commissions, and the Secretary of War is ordered to issue to them what is called a certificate, which certificate, however, shall assimilate them to the rank of commissioned officers receiving pay nearest to that which these persons received during the war.

So that it is not a merely empty honor which is being conferred upon them, nor is it a mere honor that is conferred; but it is proposed that, by operation of law, they shall now become a part of the Army and shall receive what is not merely a quasi but a real commission. Of course, this is the beginning of a movement to give to these persons some pecuniary reward; for, while this bill expressly declares that they shall not receive any, the bill puts a class of persons in court with a standing to claim a pension as soldiers in the Army. Now, as to whether they are entitled to pensions or not, I have nothing to say at this time; but I object to putting it in this form. I think there ought to be always kept clear the distinction which was recognized during the war between the civilians who were employed in subsidiary and incidental service necessary to the Army and the soldiers of the Army who were actually mustered into the service, and even if the civilian employés deserve credit or payment, I think it would be unwise to obliterate that distinction which ought always to be maintained between the enlisted man or the commissioned officer and the civilian employé.

If these persons simply desire now, after twenty-three years from the end of the war, some recognition by the Government of their honorable and meritorious service, I have nothing to object to it; but I do not think it ought to be done in such a way as to obliterate the distinction of which I have spoken.

The object of the amendment which I have offered is to preserve that distinction while providing at the same time that a roll shall be kept upon which the names of these persons shall be recorded, and a certificate given to each of them that his name is to be found on the official roll.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I recognize fully the value of time at these evening sessions. I realize that we are here for business, not for talk. I wish to say simply a half dozen words upon this bill.

In the report are cited the testimonials of such men as General Grant, General Sherman, and General McClellan as to the honorable and valuable services rendered during the war by the military telegraph corps. This bill proposes simply to give to members of this corps certificates to that effect; and it is expressly provided that the certificate shall not be construed to carry bounty, pension, or pay other than what the men have already received. I trust that we may vote promptly on the amendments and upon the bill, so as to go on with other matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill as proposed to be amended by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the names of all persons engaged in the operation and construction of military telegraph lines during the war of the rebellion shall be entered upon a roll to be kept in the War Department; and the Secretary of War is hereby directed to prepare a roll of such persons, and to issue to each, upon application, unless it appears that his service was not creditably performed, a suitable certificate of honorable service in the military telegraph corps of the Army of the United States, reciting this act and the term and character of his service: Provided, That this law shall not be construed to entitle the persons herein mentioned to any pay, allowance, bounty, or pension other than that heretofore received by them.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, it was agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD. I desire to offer an amendment to which I think no one will object, and which will improve the form of the bill. It is to insert, in line 4, after the words "military telegraph lines," the words "within the army lines."

Mr. WARNER. I have no objection to that amendment. Having introduced this bill, I wish to say that I desire to see it either withdrawn or passed promptly, so that the Military Committee can go on with their other business.

The amendment of Mr. MACDONALD was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to press upon the attention of the committee the fact that this is only a partial act of justice. If it is proper to give these certificates of service to one class of civilians, it is equally right and just to give them to others.

I must say that I have always great reluctance to specifying in our legislation a single class of persons to the exclusion of others. I think there ought to be no objection to adding to this bill these words——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman will yield a moment I think I can end this matter. The Committee on Military Affairs has authorized me to withdraw any bill which would lead to protracted debate. I am satisfied from the course of some gentlemen here to-night that they do not wish this bill to pass in any form in which it may be put. I therefore feel it incumbent on me, as a matter of duty to my committee, to ask that the bill be withdrawn from the consideration of the Committee of the Whole. I move therefore that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CULBERSON having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8003) for the relief of telegraph operators during the war, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON].

ROAD TO NATIONAL CEMETERY, BATON ROUGE, LA.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 5064) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Baton Rouge, La. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Committee of the Whole will be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and it will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing a macadamized road from the Mississippi River to the national cemetery at Baton Rouge, in the State of Louisiana: Provided, That said road shall be constructed under the supervision of the Secretary of War upon a contract let to the lowest bidder.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Military Affairs were read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the appropriation $15,000.

At the end of the bill add:

"And provided further, That the city of Baton Rouge shall bind itself to keep the road in thorough repair and in good condition, and if necessary, to further bind itself to put in suitable curbs and gutters on each side of said road."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON. On behalf of the committee I move to amend by striking out, in line 6, the word "macadamized" and inserting "graveled."

A MEMBER. What is the object of that?

Mr. ROBERTSON. It will decrease the cost of the road. The material for its construction can then be obtained in the immediate vicinity.

Mr. STEELE. I think it ought to be a macadamized road, if possible.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Such a road can not be built for the amount proposed to be appropriated. It was understood in the committee that this amendment should be made, but through inadvertence it was not included in the report.

The amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MONUMENT OF VICTIMS OF PRISON-SHIPS AT FORT GREENE.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITCH].

Mr. FITCH. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1687) for the erection and completion of a monument to the memory of the victims of prison-ships at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the report of the committee be read, subject to objection.

Mr. MAISH. Does the gentleman from Arkansas insist on the whole report being read?

Mr. SOWDEN. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the erection and completion of a monument to the memory of the victims of prison-ships, to be placed at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, State of New York.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

"Provided, That the money appropriated as aforesaid shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the plans, specifications, and design for such monument shall, before any of the money so appropriated is expended, be first approved by the Secretary of War."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I withdraw the demand for the reading of the report, but I object to the consideration of the bill unless in its regular order. The proposition of the gentleman from New York is that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To that the gentleman objects.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I object to the gentleman's request.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to say the report is lengthy, but the gentleman can state the salient features of it, and if after hearing the statement of the gentleman from New York the gentleman from Arkansas still insists on his objection, I will ask that the bill be withdrawn from the consideration of the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the gentleman from New York, then, make his statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, temporarily, until the gentleman from New York has made his statement.

Mr. FITCH. Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill is to provide a proper monument for the 11,500 Revolutionary soldiers who were starved to death in the British prison-ships in front of Brooklyn during the Revolution—soldiers whose services were recognized by the Congress of the United States over one hundred years ago, for whom a proper tomb has been built and park laid out; whose bones lie there without any monument erected over them; men who served without reward, who refused to enter the British army when they were offered promotion if they would accept service in that army; who received no pension and no reward of any kind whatever. Yet, after a hundred years, we come here from the State of New York, at the request of her Legislature, and ask the United States to place a monument over the graves of those Revolutionary soldiers who were starved to death in those British prison-ships; who, if they had accepted the terms which the British generals offered them, the British army would have been re-enforced by more men than General Washington had under him at that time, and the whole course of the Revolution might have been changed if their heroic self-sacrifice had not been carried out as it was.

The prisoners who died in those ships were from all the States of the Union. Congress protested over and over again, notably in 1781, against the manner in which they were being starved to death. They died at the rate of five per day under water in the holds of those British ships.

In view of what we have done for the soldiers of the Mexican war and for the soldiers of the civil war—to these soldiers from all the thirteen States—considering what the local authorities have done, and that we can not now give any other reward, it seems to me only proper and right this monument should be erected by Congress over their remains. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. The services of these men over whose remains this monument is to be erected were rendered over a hundred years ago, and as to what is proposed being any recompense to them, I do not think there is much in it. The money can be better expended in providing for men who endured hardships as great in the late war, many of whom are not receiving one cent in the way of pension or otherwise, and who are to be found in all of the States of the Union.

I know it may seem ungracious and possibly I may be wrong in reference to the wisdom of this expenditure. Perhaps there is money enough in the Treasury to erect this monument and to do many other things, but I doubt very much the propriety of the whole thing. As the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has withdrawn his objection I do not, however, feel like renewing it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the amendment proposed by the committee be read.

The amendment was again reported.

The amendment of the committee was adopted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I offer this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 1 by striking out the words "one hundred" and inserting "fifty," so that the appropriation will be $50,000.

Mr. FITCH. I accept the amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to delay action on this bill; but it has been suggested to me that an amendment to the bill, which I will not offer if there is objection, would not be inappropriate, by inserting a provision making an appropriation for a monument in commemoration of the battle of the Thames. Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, has been seeking for several weeks past to put on its passage a bill introduced by him for that purpose. It is proposed in that bill to erect a monument, at a cost of $25,000, over the grave of General William Henry Harrison, commemorating his fame as well as the great event of his life, the battle of the Thames, in connection with the settlement of the Northwest country.

Mr. CANNON. Why not include Tippecanoe. I suggest to my friend that we ought to have a little of this out in our own country.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], with myself, feels an interest in this bill, as well as General BROWN; and I am inclined to run the risk, if there is no objection, of the approval of the gentleman who offered the bill by submitting it as an amendment here to-night. If there be no objection, I will offer that bill as an amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I offer this amendment. I will state that the gentleman from Ohio, to whom I have referred, feels a very lively interest in this matter, as the location proposed is in his district.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as additional sections as follows:

"SEC. 2. That there shall be erected at North Bend, Ohio, a granite monument, with appropriate inscriptions, to commemorate the illustrious public services of the late William Henry Harrison.

"SEC. 3. That a commission, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, are authorized to contract for said monument.

"SEC. 4. That said monument, when completed, shall be placed in the charge and keeping of the War Department.

"SEC. 5. That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for this purpose: Provided, That no money shall be expended under this act until the title to the lot of ground upon which the monument is to be erected shall be vested, free of any cost to the Government, in the Secretary of War for the use of the United States."

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to modify that amendment by inserting $25,000 instead of $20,000. I thought the original bill provided for $25,000.

Mr. LAFFOON. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend will not insist upon the point of order. It is germane to the general subject-matter—the commemoration of great historical events occurring in this country.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then you could add a dozen or more as amendments to the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw it if there is objection; but I hope there will be none.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it. Let it stand upon its own merits.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is very appropriate on this bill; and I know if my friend will remember for a moment that this commemorates one of the most important events in the history of our Northwestern country he will not insist on the point.

Mr. LAFFOON. Legislation here ought to take its legitimate course; and I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I was about to suggest to my colleague——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I believe the point of order has been decided.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. It has been; but probably it might expedite the gentleman's bill to allow a suggestion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Certainly.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I was going to suggest to my colleague from Kentucky who raises the point of order that if he will recollect General Harrison, when he fought the battle of the Thames, was a major-general in the service of the State of Kentucky. For the purpose of giving him command of the State troops of Kentucky the governor of the State—Governor Shelby at that time—issued to him a commission as major-general, and as commander-in-chief of the troops of that State served under him at that battle. And I thought if the gentleman from Kentucky would recall those facts it is possible that he would not insist upon the point of order, and thereby keep us from securing this commemoration of a general of the State of Kentucky who saved the great Northwest by his heroic actions in that battle.

Mr. MAISH. If the point of order is withdrawn I shall renew it.

Mr. LAFFOON. I do not withdraw it, because I think it is improper legislation, and I can not consent to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and the question recurred upon its passage.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 11.

Mr. ENLOE. No quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, of course we understand that when a question of no quorum is raised in reference to the consideration of any of these bills gentlemen can, if they desire it, block in that manner the legislation for the night. If, therefore, that point is insisted upon I shall withdraw the bill.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not want to stand in the way of the legislation of the evening, but I do not think that such legislation as this should pass. I am not in favor of it, and see no way to prevent it at these night sessions except by interposing an objection of that sort.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I will give the gentleman credit for defeating the bill by asking that it be withdrawn from consideration.

The bill was withdrawn.

JAMES S. JOUETT.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. I call up the bill (H. R. 4777) in reference to restoration of James S. Jouett to military service in the Army of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the bill be read subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint James S. Jouett, late a first lieutenant of cavalry in the Army of the United States, to the position of first lieutenant of cavalry of the same grade and rank held by him April 30, 1885, the list of first lieutenants of the cavalry arm of the service being increased to that extent until a vacancy shall occur; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORD. As the report in this case is quite long, I think a brief statement from myself will explain the bill in less time than would be occupied in reading the report. Lieut. James S. Jouett was appointed from civil life as first lieutenant in the Tenth Cavalry. In 1884 his regiment was stationed at Fort Davis, Tex. He was there court-martialed for certain delinquencies—for not attending dress parade, etc.—which I shall pass over as too trivial to consider here, although the report considers them; but the main charge was that he was guilty of embezzlement under the following circumstances:

Fort Davis was situated some two or three hundred miles from San Antonio, Tex., the headquarters of the paymaster. It was customary for officers of the regiment to deposit their pay accounts in a San Antonio bank and check against them.

It seems it was the practice for the lieutenants to take charge turn about in acting as commissary of the post. Lieutenant Jouett's turn occurred in August, 1884. At the conclusion of his time of acting as post commissary, on the 30th of August, in turning over his accounts to his successor he was found to be $68 and some odd cents short, and he gave his check on the San Antonio bank for the amount. At that time he had $146 to his credit. If the check had been presented in due course by mail it would have been paid by the bank. It was given on the 30th August, 1884. It was not presented for payment at the bank until the 27th of September, nearly thirty days afterwards, and when it was presented the funds to his credit lacked $12 of satisfying the check.

The check went to protest. On his attention being called to it he at once made it good. On that state of facts he was court-martialed and dismissed from the United States Army. The court said they "find him guilty of embezzlement with no intent to embezzle." [Laughter.] They were something like the Irishman I once knew, who said to the court and jury, "Gentlemen, I am innocent of the crime that I committed." So the court found Lieutenant Jouett guilty of an offense which they say he was innocent of.

Although there were other charges—that he had missed attending dress parade, and two or three others—the main charge on which he was dismissed was that of embezzlement. His father, the gallant Admiral Jouett, was at that time at Colon, ordered there with a vessel for the discharge of some service. And here, I think, would be an opportunity for a criticism on the methods of jurisprudence of courts-martial, which, it has been suggested, are a hundred years behind the present state of civilization. The accused is tried, and his father at Colon knows nothing of it. The findings go to the Secretary of War, are approved by the President, and then for the first time he learns of it. While his father did not know he was under the charge, the order came from the President of the United States dismissing him from the service.

I have just learned that the same bill has passed the Senate to-day and lies on the Speaker's table. I ask that the Senate bill be substituted for the House bill.

Mr. DUNHAM. If the Senate only passed the bill to-day it is not here.

Mr. FORD. The bill reached the House to-day; it is exactly the same as the House bill, except that it provides—

That said Jouett shall receive no pay or allowances of any kind for the period between the date of his dismissal and date of his appointment under the provision of this bill.

I am informed that the bill passed the Senate on Saturday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senate bill being considered instead of the House bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1387) authorizing the appointment of James S. Jouett to a first lieutenancy of cavalry in the United States Army was taken from the Speaker's table and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint James S. Jouett, late a first lieutenant of cavalry in the Army of the United States, to the position of first lieutenant of cavalry, of the same grade and rank held by him April 30, 1885, the list of first lieutenants of the cavalry arm of the service being increased to that extent until a vacancy shall occur, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That said Jouett shall receive no pay or allowances of any kind for the period between the date of his dismissal and date of his appointment under the provision of this bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill H. R. 4777 was laid on the table.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YODER].

ALFRED HEDBERG.

Mr. YODER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3435), reported with amendments, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Let the bill be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask to have the report read.

Mr. YODER. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has passed a bill identical with this one, and I ask unanimous consent that it be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Senate bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Alfred Hedberg (late a captain in the Fifteenth Infantry), a captain of infantry in the Army of the United States, and that he, the said Alfred Hedberg, shall be assigned to the first vacancy of his grade occurring in the infantry arm of the service, with rank from the date of said assignment: Provided, That said Alfred Hedberg shall receive no pay for the time he was out of service, but only from the date of his assignment under this act.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen who have examined this bill say that it is a meritorious bill and should pass, and therefore I shall not consume time by insisting upon the reading of the report.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YODER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAJ. D. N. BASH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2066, and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that bill is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Well, Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite business, I ask that the Senate bill, which is identical with the House bill, be read in lieu of it. In other words, I call up the Senate bill in order to avoid delay.

The Senate bill (S. 258) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers, in settling and adjusting the accounts of Maj. Daniel N. Bash, paymaster, United States Army, are hereby directed to credit said Maj. Daniel N. Bash, paymaster, United States Army, with the sum of $7,350.93, Government funds, of which he was robbed at Antelope Springs, Wyoming Territory, March 18, 1887, without his default, while en route to pay the troops at Fort McKinney, Wyoming Territory, by one Charles Parker, since arrested and convicted of said robbery, and now imprisoned and serving his term in the penitentiary at Laramie City.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The report is somewhat lengthy, and I yield to my colleague [Mr. MASON], who will make a statement of the case.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, if the House will be patient with me I will not occupy more than two minutes in making the statement. Major Bash was a paymaster in the Army, and in 1887 he was robbed by a cowboy, through no fault of his own, while the money was left in charge of a sergeant appointed by the officer in command of the post.

The robbery was committed at a time when Major Bash was absent and when he supposed that the officer in charge had the money. He demanded a hearing and was acquitted of any neglect. The Senate committee find that there was no negligence on his part. The man who stole the money and the officer who went off and left it were the only men who were to blame for the robbery. That officer was court-martialed and dismissed from the Army. The man who stole the money, and for whose capture Major Bash spent about $2,000 of his own money, is now serving a ten years' sentence in the penitentiary. As a lawyer and as a Representative I state to gentlemen here that there is no just reason why this bill, which has received full examination by committees of the House and the Senate, should not pass.

Mr. CASWELL. It is recommended, I believe, by all the Army officers having knowledge of the circumstances.

Mr. MASON. Yes, sir; by General Sherman, General Terry, and others.

Mr. STEELE. Perhaps it ought to be stated that Major Bash, before starting on this expedition, applied for a safe, but could not get one. There was a safe, which was out of repair; and he was told it would be necessary to advertise in order to have it repaired. He offered to pay the expense himself, if the repairing could be done, but was told that it could not be. Thus he was forced to go off without a safe. It was also proved in the investigation of the matter that the men who were assigned to be his guard were not competent.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MASON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the House bill, corresponding in its provisions with the Senate bill just passed, will lie on the table.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask gentlemen to wait here a few moments longer. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has a bill which he desires to call up.

Mr. TILLMAN. I call up the bill (H. R. 1262) granting the right of way to the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad through the Fort Crawford military reservation. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be considered in the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Colorado, is hereby granted a right of way 100 feet wide across and through the Fort Crawford military reservation, located in the Uncompahgre Valley, in the State of Colorado, and an additional space, not exceeding 150 feet in width by 400 feet in length, for the location of a depot or station-house and switches, to be so located as not to interfere with any buildings or improvements thereon, and the location thereof to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar will be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and it will be considered in the House.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. What title will the company acquire in the land which is to be occupied as a depot?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will explain the bill in a very few words. I understand all the facts, and can give my assurance that they justify the passage of the bill. The Denver and Rio Grande Railroad, running from Denver to Utah, has a branch extending from a town called Montrose to another town, called Ouray, a distance of about 20 miles.

This branch road runs through the Fort Crawford military reservation. The Secretary of War granted the right of way for this branch road through that reservation, subject to revocation if Congress should fail to ratify the grant. The railroad has been built. The Government has a military encampment at Fort Crawford, where there are four or five companies of troops. This railroad is of great benefit to the public service in facilitating communication and cheapening freight. Both the Secretary of War and the Lieutenant-General of the Army have recommended the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The only information I desired was as to the depot.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill provides that the space for the depot shall not exceed 150 feet by 400.

Mr. TILLMAN. And it is stipulated that the depot shall not interfere with any of the buildings or improvements on the reservation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TILLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

It proposes to restore to a citizen of Colorado some land deeded to the Government which the Government declined to use. If there is no objection, I ask to have the bill put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury, without consideration, to make, execute, and deliver all needful instruments conveying and transferring all the right, title, and interests of the United States in and to a certain tract of land situate in the county of Fremont and State of Colorado to Anson Rudd, of Colorado; the tract of land above described being the same tract which Anson Rudd and Harriet Rudd, his wife, conveyed to the United States by general warranty deed, without consideration, dated March 20, 1868.

Mr. HAWLEY. I report a like order with regard to what is known as the Blair bill, the common-school bill. The supply is exhausted and the bill has not been printed elsewhere.

The order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed 500 copies of Senate bill 371 to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

MRS. HETTIE K. PAINTER.

Mr. PADDOCK. Yesterday I asked the Senate to consider the bill (H. R. 3839) granting a pension to Mrs. Hettie K. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am listening to the Senator.

Mr. PLUMB. Has the morning business been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not yet been concluded.

Mr. PADDOCK. It will take but a moment to pass the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I think we had better conclude the formal morning business before taking up anything else.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SHERMAN, as follows:

Resolved, That, subject to the business of the morning hour, the order of business in the Senate shall be—

First. S. 2083, a bill to provide for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

Second. S. 185, a bill to provide for the admission of the State of Dakota into the Union, and for the organization of the Territory of Lincoln.

Third. S. 1216, a bill providing for the investment of certain sums in the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. Circumstances have occurred since the resolution was offered which practically defeat it for the present, and therefore I have nothing further to say about it except to let it go on the Calendar. As the understanding I had has not been kept, I have no desire to press it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be placed on the Calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BUFFALO.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 325) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company the right of way through the Crow Indian reservation.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri rise to morning business?

Mr. VEST. No, sir; I rose to enter a motion to reconsider a bill passed on Saturday last.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the Freedman's Bank bill comes over, not exactly as unfinished business, but it was taken up and put aside by the motion to close the doors yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. The consideration of this matter will take but a short time. I gave notice a few days ago that I should ask the Senate to consider the bill, and I should be glad to have the Senate take it up this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the motion of the Senator from Missouri to reconsider a bill.

Mr. VEST. Saturday, during my absence on committee business of the Senate, a bill was passed for the construction of a public building at Buffalo, N. Y. I intended to call the attention of some brother Senators to the fact that that bill might be reached upon the Calendar. I see from the RECORD that it was passed during my absence. I am in the possession of facts in connection with that bill which in my judgment necessitate its being sent back to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which I am a member. These facts came to me after the passage of the bill, and I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. HARRIS. Also ask that the bill be returned from the other House.

Mr. VEST. It is a House bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill to which the Senator from Missouri rose has been signed by the presiding officers of the two Houses, and sent to the President of the United States.

Mr. VEST. Then I would move that the President be requested to return it to the Senate. My object is to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HISCOCK. That motion I suppose is subject to objection. If so, I object.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the Senator from Missouri is in order and is within the time in entering his motion to reconsider.

Mr. VEST. Unquestionably, within three days.

Mr. HOAR. But it will be necessary to add to that motion the introduction of a concurrent resolution requesting the President to return the bill to the House in which it originated. I suppose the Senate could do that with the concurrence of the other House, and that the voting down of such a resolution would be a disposition of the motion to reconsider. I do not see any difficulty in proposing to the other House this request to the President of the United States by a concurrent resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. If the President were notified of a motion to reconsider the bill pending in the Senate he would withhold his signature unless it was already affixed, and then a concurrent resolution could be passed by the two branches to bring the bill back. I know not exactly how it should be done, but I would suggest that the President be notified of a motion now pending in the Senate to reconsider the bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. I object to the consideration of such a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri has a right to make the motion.

Mr. VEST. I should think, without being any parliamentarian, that I had the right.

Mr. HISCOCK. Within what time must such a motion be made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Within two legislative days.

Mr. VEST. The bill was passed on Saturday. If I have not that right I have none.

Mr. HISCOCK. Was the bill passed on Saturday or on Friday?

Mr. VEST. It was passed on Saturday.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senate was not in session on Friday.

Mr. VEST. I was absent from the city on Saturday on the committee which went to New York by direction of the Senate, or I should have objected to the passage of the bill. It was a neglect on my part. At what time was the bill passed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The record will be referred to by the clerks. [A pause.] An inspection of the Journal shows that the bill passed the Senate on Saturday, the 31st of March. This being the 4th day of April, more than two legislative days have intervened, and the Chair would hold that the motion could not be entertained.

Mr. VEST. I suppose that is true.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

BILLINGS, CLARK'S FORK AND COOKE CITY RAILROAD.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 325) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company the right of way through the Crow Indian reservation.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate.

Mr. DAVIS. I simply desire to object to the present consideration of the bill if it will involve debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not open to debate. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 25, noes 14.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the title of the bill be read again, and then I shall ask for the yeas and nays, so that we may know what the Senate is entering upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be again read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 325) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company the right of way through the Crow Indian reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the question of proceeding to the consideration of this bill, the Senator from Indiana asks that the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal. Are they desired by one-fifth of the Senators present?

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I deem it necessary to say a word in relation to this bill. It is in the usual form of rights of way granted to railroad companies to build railroads across Indian reservations.

There is opposition to the passage of this bill, I understand, on the part of another railroad company, and, as I understand, there is opposition from no other quarter except a rival railroad company. The facts about this rival company, the Rocky Fork Company, and this company, the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Company, are these: In June, 1886, a bill was introduced giving the right of way to this railroad company. In January following a bill was introduced in the Senate of the United States giving the other railroad company, the one opposed to this, a right of way across the same reservation and on practically parallel lines. Both these bills were reported from the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs to the Senate and both passed this body at the last session of Congress; both went to the House of Representatives; both were reported favorably by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, and both were on the Calendar of the House. On the last night of the last session of Congress the bill providing for the rival railroad, the one opposed to this, the Rocky Fork Railroad Company, passed the House of Representatives; and the bill giving the right of way to this company, which had been reported before the other bill in the House, which had passed this body before and which had been introduced into this body months before that, died on the Calendar and was not passed.

Now, after the Government of the United States has granted to the Rocky Fork Company the right to build their road, they come in at this session and object to the Government granting to the Billings Company exactly the same privileges they had at the hands of Congress last year, and can give no reason for it, as I understand, except that they say that they probably can not get the financial aid necessary to build their road if this Billings road is allowed to go through the reservation.

I know nothing whatever of these companies further than that both came here and represented that they were able to build their railroad lines, and one succeeded in getting a bill granting the right of way passed at the last session of Congress and has done some work on the line. This one failed to get through although it had been introduced some months before the Rocky Fork Company began their effort, and now these people come and object to the very same privilege being extended to the Billings Company that was extended at the last Congress to their own company. It seems to me that it does not look well for them to occupy this position.

The purpose of both these roads, I understand, is to reach certain coal, beds for the supply of coal to Montana and Wyoming and all that great country in the Yellowstone Valley. I believe one railroad reaching these coal-beds is a good thing, but I believe that two railroads would be more than twice as good, and public policy requires that while the Rocky Fork road reaches the coal-beds we should allow the Billings Company to do the same thing, so that there may be some competition for the benefit of those who are in need of fuel in the cold winters of that rigorous climate.

These are the simple points at issue on this question, and I can not believe that the Congress of the United States, having given the right to the Rocky Fork Company to build their road to the coal-beds, will deny the same right to another company, which was organized months before the Rocky Fork Company; which came here six or eight months before they came; which passed their bill through this body before the other passed their bill at the last session, and had their bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House last year before they passed theirs. Under these circumstances I am sure the Senate will say that this company, which was prior in organization and in application, shall not now be denied the right to build its line through this Indian territory. The company have located under the general laws their route over the public land outside of the Crow country. Out of the entire line there are about 40 miles going through the Crow reservation. The road goes through a part of the country that can occasion the Indians no inconvenience. The public interest, and the interests of all the people concerned in the development of the coal-fields, and everybody else, except those who would make a monopoly of the Rocky Fork grant of the right of way, are in favor of the passage of the bill as it is. I hope it will be passed.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the bill grant anything but a right of way?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Nothing whatever except the naked right of way through this Indian territory.

Mr. GEORGE. Was there a rivalry at the last session of Congress between these companies, either opposing the other?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Not a syllable from either one that came to my knowledge, and I reported both bills from the Committee on Indian Affairs, if I am not mistaken, and neither company said one word against granting the right of way to the other whilst these matters were pending before the Indian Committee.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is perhaps unfortunate that the Committee on Indian Affairs has made no report of the history of this transaction, and especially of what has happened since the act of last winter, by which the company which I shall style the Rocky Forks company was authorized to go through this reservation. It is probable that the Senator from Arkansas has stated the facts of this case with substantial correctness.

As I understand them, they are about as follows: These two companies—it is immaterial when they were organized or when they first thought of building a railroad through an Indian reservation—were competitors before the Congress of the United States for legislation which authorized each of them to build a railroad through the Crow reservation to reach certain coal-mines beyond it. The result of it all was that, although the Senate passed a bill for both, when the matter came before the House of Representatives the Rocky Forks company was authorized to build its railroad through this reservation, and the company whose claims are now under consideration, either by an adverse vote or by their case never being reached in the House, never obtained that right.

The facts of the case are illustrated by a map which I hold in my hand, and which, of course, I shall have to describe, as I can not show it to the Senate.

These companies, as the Senator from Arkansas concedes, propose to run over substantially the same line. The starting-point is the town of Billings, on the Northern Pacific Railroad. From thence each line goes through a total wilderness, except so far as Indians are concerned, to its other terminal point. As I am informed, the located routes of both these companies show that the line of the company now under consideration lies parallel within a distance of a quarter of a mile of the Rocky Forks road for 24 miles, from Laurel to the mouth of Rocky Creek. There is a point of divergence when they get down farther into the wild country and beyond the reservation to a place called O'Hara, and from there this company parallels the Rocky Forks road to the final terminal point at Cooke City. In other words, out of a total mileage of 120 miles the road which now seeks privileges through that reservation parallels the road which was authorized to go through there last year for 86 miles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How near?

Mr. DAVIS. For the first 24 miles within a quarter of a mile, and for the rest of the line it is represented to me through a cañon on lines identical.

Mr. President, the facts are that the road that now seeks the right to go through this Indian reservation has taken no steps beyond the agitation in Congress and perhaps the laying out of a paper route. The Rocky Forks road immediately on the passage of the act of last year proceeded in construction and graded and bridged 46 miles south from the Northern Pacific road at an expense of about $100,000, and now are negotiating for the money with which to buy the rails for that portion, and is met by the menace of this bill, which parallels and threatens it for 86 miles out of 120 of its entire course, and has been discredited in financial circles by the menace of this bill.

Now, who believes that in good faith this second railroad company is going to build a railroad of 120 miles south into that wilderness in competition with one which has already built, so far as grading and bridging are concerned, one-third of its entire line? Was it ever heard, where a right of way had been granted to a railroad through a reservation and confessedly for the uses of the public, that when the company that had obtained such a grant had gone on in good faith and expended its money, had bridged and graded a large portion of the line, another road would be authorized paralleling it within a quarter of a mile for 24 miles, and for the rest of the distance enough to make the parallelism 86 miles out of 120?

What would be said if this was a large transaction, the case of a continental road going from the Mississippi to the ocean? Would it be tolerated for a moment that under the guise of a right of way through the public lands or Indian reservations one railroad would be allowed to parallel another within a space so narrow as that, and especially when the road which had obtained the privilege had gone on and invested money, when men had put their means into it on the faith of Congressional action after a competitive struggle between these two companies, one of which had failed and now reappears here in the halls of legislation?

The Rocky Forks company was required by the terms of the act of last winter to obtain the consent of the Indians, which it did, and to make compensation to the Indions. That it did. It is required to build the road in two years; and now, within twelve months after they have obtained their right and by proceeding have assumed that obligation, this company, which entered into the competition with them one year ago and which for some reason or other did not get from Congress the similar right to that which it now claims, appears here with a bill which proposes substantially to parallel this route from initial point to terminal point. It is nothing but a menace at the financial standing of this company. It necessarily operates in that way. I am informed that the presence of this bill and the persistency with which it has been pushed is the obstacle which prevents these gentlemen who have put their money into construction from obtaining the funds with which to iron the 46 miles they have ready for completion.

I repeat, it is not to be tolerated. It seems to me, looking at this question judicially, that where the Government has induced a corporation to undertake the construction of a road 120 miles into a wilderness to develop the mineral resources of an unknown and unentered country, and it has gone on in good faith and expended its money as it has here in the reliance that to it there was a privilege, a right of way there, and a territorial right if you please, it does not consist with good faith to allow another company to come in the next year and receive precisely similar rights and conditions to menace, break down, and perhaps destroy entirely the enterprise on which so much money has been expended in good faith.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the passage of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the question, Shall the bill pass? the Senator from Minnesota asks that the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I refrain from voting.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE] and will not vote on this bill. I do not know how he would vote, if present.

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am generally paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] as a rule. But I suppose he would not regard the pair as extending to this bill, and I therefore vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted in the affirmative not remembering at the moment that I was paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I do not know how the Senator from Vermont would vote if present, and I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws his vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Bate,	Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Reagan,
Beck,	Dawes,	Jones of Arkansas,	Sawyer,

NAYS—15.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Sabin,	Vest,

ABSENT—32.

Aldrich,	Eustis,	Hiscock,	Quay,

Chace,	Gibson,	Paddock,	Stockbridge,
Chandler,	Gray,	Pasco,	Turpie,
Cullom,	Hale,	Platt,	Vance,
Daniel,	Harris,	Plumb,	Wilson of Md.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. DAWES. Before the bill passes away from the Senate I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed.

The location of this road is so far outside of the Yellowstone Park that it was not deemed necessary to say a word about it, but I find in the other bill passed last year this phrase:

That no part of said line shall touch any portion of the National Park.

I ask unanimous consent that that phrase may be put in the fourth section of this bill, at the end of the fourth section, precisely where it is in the other, so that it will be impossible for them to change their line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 4 it is proposed to add the following proviso:

And provided further, That no part of said line shall touch any portion of the National Park.

Mr. DAWES. The reason it was not put in is that the location filed with the committee went around the park entirely, but I should like to have that certain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To journalize it correctly, there had better be a motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be so arranged that it shall state that the bill was amended and then read the third time and passed, the amendment being now made by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

THE FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1138, which was before the Senate yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before action is taken on that I desire to give notice that to-morrow, after the conclusion of the morning business, I will ask the Senate to take up the motion submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer the message of the President to the Committee on Finance, for the purpose of submitting some remarks.

Mr. PALMER. Will that displace the special order?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That is not my purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand the Senator from Iowa was giving some notice of what he intended to do to-morrow. I should like to hear what that was. I could not hear him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa gave notice that he proposed to-morrow to submit some observations on the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio, to refer the message of the President of the United States to the Committee on Finance. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I notice in the RECORD this morning that there was no objection offered yesterday to taking up this bill, and it could not have been taken up with an objection. I distinctly did object to taking up the bill, and I ask at this time the Senate to consider that I know several Senators around me concurred in making the objection. I made the objection, and therefore it can not come up as a bill unobjected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before the vote is taken——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia will observe that this motion must be decided without debate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. On one objection, with a request that the RECORD be corrected to that extent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EVARTS, in line 10, before the word "representatives," to strike out "legal" and insert "personal."

Mr. SHERMAN. That is an amendment suggested by the Senator from New York. He thinks it is an improvement of the bill. I do not see the difference. I am perfectly willing to agree to it if it is thought to improve the bill, but I would rather have any language that may be suggested by any Senator that will confine the beneficiaries of this bill absolutely to the depositors, so that no assignment shall be effective, because, as a matter of course, there is no equity in favor of the assignee, this being a bounty of the Government. If the language is not strong enough in the bill, I should like very well to have an amendment that would make it stronger. I think either term "personal representatives" or "legal representatives" would be sufficient.

Mr. VEST. I concur with the Senator from Ohio that there ought to be no payment to any assignee.

Mr. VOORHEES. The bill has not yet been read. Let us hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was read at length when previously under consideration. It will be again reported.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want it read now, so that as we are to vote on it we may know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest that instead of "legal representatives" the words "widows and children" be inserted; so that these funds will only be payable to the claimant if living and if dead to his widow and children, and go no further.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to agree to that amendment. This bill being reported from the Finance Committee and prepared by the Comptroller of the Currency and recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, I do not feel disposed to accept any amendment, but I shall not object to the one proposed.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to one point. A depositor in the Freedman's Bank might have had a mother, now an aged woman, dependent upon him and upon getting back this money that was stolen away; or he might have had helpless brothers or sisters. I think the bill ought to be passed as it was reported. Plenty of these people who left no widow or children might have left others who had just as high a claim as a descendant would have. The bill has been carefully considered, as the Senator from Ohio knows better than I, by the Finance Committee, and I doubt if it can be improved. It was drawn by the Comptroller of the Currency and recommended by the President of the United States, and has had ample consideration.

Mr. DAWES. Does the bill exclude assignees?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes; leaving the law in each State to determine where the money goes.

Mr. DAWES. If it excludes assignees it is right.

Mr. VOORHEES. It does.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill contains this provision:

> But no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid to any assignee of any such depositors, and the benefit and relief provided by this act shall extend only to those depositors in whose favor such balances have been properly verified, and to their heirs and legal representatives.

Now, if the Senate wish to further qualify it by limiting it to only the parents or children of deceased depositors, I do not know but that it would be better.

Mr. VOORHEES. The bill is better as it is, in my judgment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Ohio inform the Senate what percentage of the deposits has been returned to the depositors of the Freedman's Bank?

Mr. SHERMAN. Sixty-three per cent., according to the report of the Comptroller.

Mr. BUTLER. Leaving 37 per cent. to be paid out under this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. The term "legal representatives" would include an administrator, who would get that money into his hands, and it would be assets to pay debts.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is proposed to insert "personal representatives;" but who are they?

Mr. DAWES. I only make the suggestion that I should be afraid that simply the words "legal representatives" would include an administrator, who would distribute the money to pay debts. If the Senator is certain it would not, very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not say about that. I do not care which term is adopted, but it is difficult to draw the line. Is a father a personal representative?

Mr. DAWES. Suppose you limit it to heirs at law.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would hardly do, because it is pretty difficult for the great body of these people to know who are the heirs at law. This has been a subject of controversy. I think it ought to be confined to the parents and children, and if there are no parents or children living let it remain in the Treasury.

Mr. BUTLER. Can the Senator from Ohio inform the Senate how this money has been paid out by the Commissioner up to this time? I suppose some rule has been adopted in this matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is the whole distribution of this money in a table which, if the Senator desires, may be transposed from the RECORD of a year ago, which gives the amount of each dividend, the total payments, and the payments made at the different branches, of which there were 25, I believe. The whole amount that has been paid from the assets of the company is $1,721,751.22, which, if I remember correctly, was 63 per cent., leaving 37 per cent. yet to be provided for, which is covered by this bill.

Mr. BUTLER. I take it for granted that money has been paid out from time to time by the Commissioner, under some rule which he has adopted, to the legal representatives or to the personal representatives of deceased depositors. So I can not see that there will be any great difficulty in managing the fund under the bill as it now stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is paid out to legal representatives.

Mr. BECK. The Comptroller of the Currency can pay out the money under this bill without any difficulty. He drew the bill, and can distribute the fund with perfect equity. I went there myself and saw how it had been done. There can be no difficulty about it if we take the bill as reported.

Mr. BUTLER. So I supposed, and therefore I suggest that the language of the bill be permitted to remain as it came from the committee, and the commissioner of the Freedman's Bank I think will guard it in every possible way that he can, as he has heretofore. There has been 63 per cent. of the money paid out, and I take it that he can pay the remainder.

Mr. DAWES. I am quite confident an administrator could compel it to be paid to him if the language of the law was simply "legal representatives." It would be so in my State. An administrator is a legal representative in my State.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to suggest to him that I think it absolutely clear that if the bill requires the money to be paid to a legal representative or a personal representative, the commissioner would be bound, where there is an administrator or an executor, to pay it to such fiduciary character, and he would be bound to treat it as assets in his hands, subject to the payment of debts. I do not think there is any question about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have this money paid out to the persons who are properly entitled to it; that is, to the depositors or to their heirs or to their executors or administrators. I fear—and I had that fear when the bill was up at the last session—that, under the terms of the bill, claim agents will find out the names of depositors, many of whom are ignorant persons, unaccustomed to business, and will go around, visit them, and get powers of attorney with large contingent fees, and in that way evade the provision of the statute which prevents the payment of this money to assignees.

I would be glad before the Government makes this reparation to that class of people, very much unaccustomed to business, that some provision should be put in the bill requiring the Government, at its own expense, to go around and pay this money into the identical hands which are entitled to receive it. I think there is the great defect of this bill. I think that under the cover of agency a large portion of this fund will never reach the persons who we intend shall have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. The suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi is very pertinent. There will be hundreds of these depositors, as there have been heretofore, who will not present claims for the dividends. Some gentleman through intelligence and cunning will suggest to some probate court in some State or other the death of this claimant; the probate judge will order letters of administration to be granted to him, and he will present those letters here to the Department and draw the money, and the Comptroller or any one else can not prevent his getting it. He can not go behind the letters of administration, and he becomes the legal representative; and no heir, no father, or mother, or grandchild, and no other relative of the deceased will ever get the benefit of a solitary cent of this money.

I have no doubt that many of the depositors' bank-books have been bought up. This bounty of the Government—for it is a bounty pure and simple and unadulterated—unless it is confined to the actual sufferers, had better be called a bounty to claim agents and sharks. They will get powers of attorney and they will present them here as representing the claimants themselves, and you cannot refuse or decline to recognize them, and they will get the lion's share of the money before it ever goes into the hands of the parties themselves.

This bill should be restricted so that the money should be paid to the parties themselves in person if living, and if dead then to a specified class. The bounties of the Government ought not to go to an administrator or to a legal representative of that kind. They should go either to the widow or children, or to the father, mother, brothers, and sisters. They should be definite, and if such persons are not in existence the tax-payers of this country ought not to be called upon to take money out of their pockets and pay it to a mere cold administrator to divide between him and a claim agent; and therefore I insist upon an amendment that will restrict the payment to the parties themselves, or the widow, the children, the father, mother, brothers, or sisters if living, and that under no circumstances shall any payment be made to legal representative or to any attorney in law or in fact. That is the amendment I propose.

Mr. SHERMAN. How would the words "widow or next of kin" answer?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAWES. That is only one individual.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the more we examine it the more difficult we shall find it.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is an absolute necessity for an amendment. I move to strike out "to their legal representatives" and insert, "to the widow and children, and if no widow or children, then"—I would confine it to parents or brothers and sisters.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator hear an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time, a proviso to come in at the end of the bill?

Provided, That no payment shall be made under this act except to the parties entitled to it, and no agent or attorney shall, in any case, receive any part of such payment.

Mr. COCKRELL. That will not cover the whole point.

Mr. GEORGE. No, I know it will not.

Mr. COCKRELL. A draft will be issued and it will be handed over to agents, and then they will get the money and hold it under the power of attorney. I move to strike out the words "legal representatives" and insert:

The widow and children, if any, and if not, then to the father, mother, brothers, and sisters.

I would stop there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands there is already one amendment pending to the bill. Does the Senator from Missouri who now has the floor propose to amend the pending amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there an amendment of my colleague [Mr. VEST]?

Mr. VEST. I offered no amendment to the bill. The Senator from New York did.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think I offered an amendment myself.

Mr. VEST. When the bill was pending before for consideration I suggested an amendment, and the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] moved that the word "legal" be stricken out and the word "personal" inserted before "representatives."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the present occupant of the chair took the chair he was informed that there was an amendment pending offered by the Senator from Missouri. The Secretary has since informed me——

Mr. VEST. I would suggest to my colleague that I intended to offer this amendment:

No payment shall be made under the provisions of this act to any person without the commissioner being first satisfied that the person claiming is the original party entitled to the same under the provisions of this act, or the widow or heir of such party.

That would leave the question of who were the heirs to the laws of the respective States or the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I modify my amendment to strike out "legal representatives" and say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would call attention to the fact that the pending amendment must first be disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. That can be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the pending amendment?

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I offer the amendment, in line 10, to strike out "legal representatives" and insert:

Or to the widows and heirs of the said depositors.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the Senator a different phraseology.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 10, after the word "their," it is proposed to strike out "legal representatives" and insert "the widows or heirs."

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to my friend this difficulty in regard to that amendment: Suppose the woman was not married; she could not then be a widow.

Mr. DAWES. What does "widow or heirs" mean? Does not that leave it optional?

Mr. SHERMAN. The first few lines of the bill contain the whole measure of its application, leaving it to the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe regulations and the Comptroller to say how it shall be done. As for requiring the payments to be made to the individual depositors, it is utterly out of the question. There are many of these depositors whom the officers of the Government can never reach. They can not reach them all, but as a matter of course it is the business of the Treasury Department to see that this money gets into the hands of the beneficiaries, and you must leave a little latitude of regulation to the Government officers. I am willing to trust them, and it seems to me that gentlemen on the other side ought to be willing to trust them to get this money to the persons to whom it belongs without any further regulations in the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not quite agree with the Senator from Missouri, who says that this is a matter of benevolence and generosity. I think there is a degree of moral obligation on the Government. The poor people who deposited in this bank looked upon it as in reality the Government itself, and they are not to be wondered at for that. It did seem to them as virtually the Government, and I think that the nation is largely responsible for the mismanagement of that bank.

As to the amendments proposed, I agree entirely with the two or three Senators who have objected to them. Let us stand by the bill as it comes from the Treasury Department and comes from the Finance Committee; and as the fund has been hitherto administered it has been done without complaint, probably without serious injustice. We are told that payments were made to persons not entitled to them. That is likely to happen in any case where there are a multitude of small payments to be made to citizens. We are passing bills here every session whereby a catalogue of scores and hundreds of people are entitled to sums of money from $1 upwards, and it is not to be supposed that in every case every one of these payments is legitimately and properly made. There will be mistakes, but the Treasury Department and the commissioner I am satisfied have administered this trust as faithfully as possible, and probably quite as near to exact equity and justice as we shall get after a score of amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator will not apply to this class of claims. They were paid as long as there was any money to pay them. That fund was exhausted and they have the evidences of their deposits. They are in small amounts. If the truth were known, probably one-fourth or more is in the hands of assignees to-day. These parties supposed they had got all they ever would get. They have been told that, by the proper authorities, "this is the last dividend you will get," and they have been willing to sell their claims for a song and transfer them, and it is that class of people who will be benefited by the bill and ought not to be benefited by it. Therefore I insist on confining it to the parties themselves, if living, and if not living then to their widows and children, and if there be no widows or children, then to the father, mother, brother, and sister. That is just as far as we ought to go.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. One moment. I will change the language of the amendment in a moment.

Mr. VEST. Here is an amendment I have drawn:

No payment shall be made under the provisions of this act to any person without the commissioner being first satisfied that the person claiming is the original party entitled to the same under the provisions of this act, or the widow and children, if there be any, and if not, the father and mother, and if not, the brothers and sisters, if any, and none others.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, let that go in.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator from Missouri will yield to me for a moment I think I can suggest an amendment.

Mr. TELLER. We can not hear a word that is said in that part of the Chamber.

Mr. BUTLER. I can scarcely hear myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Conversation must cease in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. BUTLER. I was going to propose an amendment which has been suggested to me by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. After the word "prescribe," in the seventh line, insert:

And which shall be so framed as to secure the payment hereunder directly, as far as possible, to the parties interested.

So as to read:

That the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and his successors in office, be, and the same are hereby, authorized and directed to pay, or cause to be paid, under such regulations as said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, and which shall be so framed as to secure the payment hereunder directly, as far as possible, to the parties interested.

There is great force in what has been said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] in regard to claim agents and sharks and so on. With that class of people I have no sympathy. But, as was suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], there is more or less abuse in all matters of this kind, and it is impossible to frame any law which can anticipate and prevent every detail of that kind. All that the legislative department can do is to guard a fund like this as carefully as possible, and leave to the executive department the enforcement of the law. I have heard no complaint so far as to the manner in which this fund has been administered by the respective commissioners of the Freedman's Bank, and I am quite sure that the present commissioner, who I understand has framed this bill, will be especially vigilant and careful in scrutinizing the authority of everybody who comes to represent any of these poor people. It seems to me that the bill as it came from the committee was quite sufficient; but in order "to make assurance double sure," and to put the commissioner upon notice that these claims may be represented by people who ought not to represent them, I suggest the language which I shall presently read.

I have heard no complaint about the manner in which these deposits have been paid out from time to time, and I do not apprehend there will be any great difficulty now. If we attempt to restrict it, as has been suggested by the Senator from Missouri, to the widows and children, the brothers and sisters and fathers and mothers, and nobody else, it might put many of these people to very great inconvenience.

Mr. COCKRELL. How?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Missouri asks how. There are many of them who, I dare say, would not get more than a dollar; perhaps the deposits vary from $1 up to $25, or $30, or $40, or $50. Suppose one of my constituents should send to me, saying, "I am entitled to a dollar or two dollars"——

Mr. SHERMAN. The average amount will be about $25 to each depositor.

Mr. BUTLER. About $25. I should be precluded under this act, as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Missouri, from going to the commissioner and saying, "Here, give me a check for this amount, and let me send it to this poor woman or this poor man." The poor beneficiaries would not be able to employ attorneys.

I take it the commissioner will scrutinize carefully every person who represents these people, and will as far as possible protect them against fraud and imposition. So I do not apprehend so much trouble as seems to be in the minds of some Senators.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I modify my amendment, to strike out the words "legal representatives" and insert:

To the widow and children, if any; if not, then to the father and mother, if living; and if not, then to the brothers and sisters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri modifies his amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I modify the amendment in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified will be stated.

Mr. REAGAN. Add "and none others."

Mr. HISCOCK. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri whether he would not like this amendment: Strike out the words, "their legal representatives" and insert in the place thereof:

To the widow and next of kin respectively of the depositors, according to the statutes of the State or Territory or District of Columbia, in which the depositors reside.

Of course, in personal property it is next of kin to whom it would pass. This is personal property.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think my amendment will be more specific and definite.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is there not a question under the Senator's provision whether the grandchildren would not be excluded?

Mr. COCKRELL. I think they would be excluded. By the payment of this sum we are making a reimbursement to the parties who were misled and not to remote beneficiaries.

Mr. HISCOCK. And why give it to the brothers and sisters of the depositor as against the immediate descendants?

Mr. COCKRELL. Senators have thought it ought to be extended that far, and I think that is far enough to go in that line.

Mr. HISCOCK. If the money is the property of the deceased, it certainly should go to his immediate representatives—I mean the next of kin. This amendment which I propose I will read again:

To be distributed to the widow and next of kin respectively of said depositors, according to the statutes of distribution of the State or Territory or the District of Columbia, as the case may be, in which the depositors reside.

The law itself settles that. The Senator from South Carolina knows precisely the proportions which his constituents will be entitled to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 10, after the word "their," it is proposed to strike out the words "legal representatives" and insert:

Widow and children, if there be any; if not, to the father and mother, if any; and if not, to the brothers and sisters, if any, and none others.

Mr. VOORHEES. I want to inquire what is the matter with grandchildren? Why draw the line on them?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will say to the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. VOORHEES. I concur in the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York. That is right, and it is substantially what the bill now is; but I am perfectly willing, in order to make it clear and explicit, to vote for his amendment. I wish the Senator would send it to the desk and have it read.

Now, I may not be as patient in regard to the strictures on this bill as some others. Here is a case where the Government started a bank for these poor, ignorant people. They had faith to deposit their money, and there is a balance due them. It was under Government supervision. They have a right to demand that the Government shall make them good; and wherever their money would have gone in their hands and to whomsoever it would have descended had it remained there and they had not been plundered, it should go now. I think it ought to be provided for in this law.

I have no fear of claim agents. I do not see them. They do not haunt me. I know the present Comptroller of the Currency has a large discretion in regard to this matter; but I am willing to trust him. As the Senator from South Carolina well said, there are strictures offered to this bill that would make it impossible for some far-away, ignorant negro man or negro woman to get his or her money. She would have to come here in person or go without it. A friend of hers could not go and get it and send it to her. There is needless alarm upon these small questions. I believe the bill is right as it came from the Committee on Finance. I thought so in the committee; I think so now. I think it covers every one of these questions. "Legal representatives" or "heirs at law" are practically those to whom it should go, and that of course will be governed by the statutes of the place where the person lives.

The amendment offered by the Senator from New York makes it more plain; that is all the difference; and I am perfectly willing to vote for that amendment, but as to voting for an amendment that prescribes what kindred it shall go to and stops short of where the law stops, I will not vote for such an amendment. The man might have grandchildren to whom this money should descend as certainly as to anybody else, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri would draw a line on their kinship. It is not correct, and I hope it will be voted down. While I do not see the absolute necessity, yet I am perfectly willing to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, because it makes plain what the meaning is.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] calls my attention to the fact, which I remembered not so clearly as I do now, as I have not read the bill since it was reported, that this language is used in the bill:

That the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and his successors in office—

That is, the Comptroller of the Currency—

be, and the same are hereby, authorized and directed to pay, or cause to be paid, under such regulations as said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe.

There is frightful danger of wrong, and of giving it to the claim agents under that in the estimation of some, but none according to my understanding. They have a discretion to prescribe regulations such as honest men intending to correct a great wrong would doubtless prescribe.

It is perfectly safe to support this bill as it came from the Finance Committee. At the same time, to meet the criticisms that may arise in some minds, I would be willing to take the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], but not the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York did not state whether he offered his amendment as an amendment to the amendment or as a substitute.

Mr. HISCOCK. I offered it as a substitute.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am going to request of the Senate that these amendments be all printed in such a way as that we can understand them. There are a few Senators who have offered amendments to this bill who do not seem to understand that there were no marital relations in the slave States of the South among the negroes, and that widows and orphans are defrauded by this bill more than they were by the Freedman's Bank itself. There is no widowhood as of the day when the bank fell——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia will suspend for a moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, being the bill (H. R. 5034) to provide for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the regular order be informally laid aside with a view to continue and close the pending matter. I think we can close it in a short time.

Mr. STEWART. I object, if debate is going to continue. We shall not get through with the bill in two hours, I fear.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit the motion, at any rate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I was asked to suspend, and I did so, in deference to the Chair.

Mr. STEWART. I am willing the debate shall proceed by unanimous consent if we can have the liberty of interposing an objection hereafter, if the debate goes on at any considerable length.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go on by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside.

Mr. HARRIS. Reserving the right, as I understand the Senator from Nevada, to call for the regular order whenever any Senator chooses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reserving the right of the friends of the unfinished business to call for it at a future time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish I could make some statement which, as I think, would represent the very element that seems to be under consideration, without being retarded in speech further than my physical condition requires me to be. I represent that element from the South. I am the only man on this floor from the South who does; and I am not afraid to represent it. I say that if the amendments which have been offered to the bill shall be put upon it, this measure will perpetrate a greater fraud upon the freedmen of the South than the bank itself. There are no widows among them; there are no legitimate children and no legitimate grandchildren among them. It is nonsense to legislate in the way proposed. You propose to put it in the power of some one to use a mere matter of legislation for a political purpose.

The Freedman's Bank was instituted to take care of the colored people, and the Government for the time being became their guardian. The Government itself defaulted when the bank defaulted, and the Government can not make good the money so far as the colored people of the South are concerned if it uses the term "wives, children, and grandchildren." A ten-line bill would answer all the purpose, to pay back the money to those who earned a living, and those only, for the others are not thinking of it.

As to the claim agent, if you take that provision out of the bill you destroy it so far as it can conserve any interest to the poor, uneducated freedman, for if the liberated slave is to get any benefit under the bill at all, if it shall become a law, he can not come here; he must have an agent. Fix it as you fix your pension bills. If a man shall charge more than a certain sum for procuring a pension, you punish him under your criminal laws. If you provide that because a man happens to be an attorney in the city of Washington he is to be tabooed and is not to be recognized at all, you simply say to the laboring, ignorant negro, who would get something under the bill if it means anything, that he shall not approach this capital unless he shall walk from his home here.

I ask that the Senate will print these amendments and allow us to see them, for if I mean anything in the action which I shall ask on this bill, it will be that those whom it is intended to benefit shall receive that which the Government ought, by such a law as this, to give them, and they will not receive it under the amendments offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitution of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, if any Senator desires time to consider the exact operation of any of the amendments which have been offered, I would not, of course, oppose the postponement of this measure until it could be a little more sedately considered. But I do not conceive that the objections which the Senator from Virginia has stated are altogether practical ones. It can not be said in reference to the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor that the widowhood or the childhood or the right of inheritance of the colored people was not as thoroughly recognized by law as that of any other race.

The first Legislature of Virginia that assembled when the war had just ended, and before the days of reconstruction came, legitimated and recognized the relations de facto which had existed between different members of the colored race, and the decisions of the courts have sustained the legislative acts, which are but types of acts of the same character that were passed at different times throughout the Southern country.

I am aware that at this distance of time, after nearly a quarter of a century, there will be difficulty in tracing these relations. That would exist in any race where time, and casualty, and death, and removals had separated the individual members of a family. But if we propose to do justice we must approximate it by the best method that the law admits of. These practical difficulties that inhere in the very nature of human affairs are simply matters which can not be overcome, and must be surrendered to when the difficulties of tracing relationship become unsurmountable.

I think it would perhaps be best to let the bill go over to-day, so that the minds of those gentlemen who have addressed attention to apparent defects or insufficiencies in it might have time to dwell upon them and to perfect the amendments which they desire to offer.

As to the bill itself, it seems to me that it is a humane and just bill. It is true that the Government is not legally liable in a technical sense to pay any of the debts which were contracted by the Freedman's Bank, which came into being just after the war; but while this legal and technical liability does not exist, there is a moral liability resulting out of the very peculiar and extraordinary conditions of the colored race and the country at the time the Freedman's Bank was operating.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him?.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to his colleague?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. There is no difference between my colleague and myself as to the legal aspect. I think we are both acquainted with the fact that the mother of Blind Tom (about whose maternal relationship there was no doubt, and all the doubt was on the other side) could not even recover her right to control him in a Virginia court, or in even a United States court. That is the point I endeavored to make. I beg pardon for interrupting my colleague.

Mr. DANIEL. I am not familiar with the litigation (except in a most general way) concerning Blind Tom, but I do know what has been the general course of adjudication in our State and what have been the acts of its Legislature. I do know the fact that the relations between the colored people which have been alluded to have been established in law and are recognized to relate back to former times, and to legitimate the de facto relations which then existed.

I was not attempting to answer any argument of the Senator from Virginia when I adverted to the general character of the bill. I was answering in that particular line the objections of other gentlemen who seem to think that this bill is not warranted because there is no legal liability upon the part of the Government to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Bank, and I was about to say when I yielded to his inquiry that the conditions under which these deposits were made were unprecedented conditions and conditions which can never transpire again. An ignorant race which had been under the domination of another had suddenly merged into freedom.

The Government was recognized by the colored people as assuming for the nonce and until established law should be settled all over the Southern country—as taking superintendence over their affairs in life. They were, in the parlance of the times, "the wards of the nation." Therefore when a band, a drum, a flag, came along, or anything that had on it the stamp of the United States under its laws was presented to those people, they did not look beyond its ostensible character to consider its real one. There was not one of them who deposited his money in the bank who did not feel that the faith and the pledge of the Government was behind the bank and that he was confiding his little property into its hands to be faithfully restored.

As this was the general and popular apprehension, and as the Government put forward the agencies which created that apprehension, while like other gentlemen I will not contend that there is a legal liability which could be enforced, or one which is legally binding, to be enforced, I yet also recognize that there is a moral responsibility about it which, in the fair dealings between man and man, Government and citizen, should incline the Government to restore to these poor people the little sums which they hoarded from their earnings and thought they were confiding to its care.

Every one of these depositors can not come here to get his or her money; for instance, it will be impossible for a colored man or woman in Mississippi or Louisiana or Texas to come in propriâ personâ to the Treasury and present his or her claim. It will be necessary that the usual agencies which are employed by men for the purpose of presenting and proving claims shall be employed by them. Instead of prohibiting this to be done, as some propose, it seems to me that the bill properly contemplates that rules and regulations shall be prepared by the head of the Treasury Department, which will put around the transaction all the safeguards which can occur to a man of intelligence looking to the faithful discharge of the trust committed to his hands.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me suggest that there is no trouble in the world with the Treasury Department paying the money directly to the parties through the postmasters at the various places. They are bonded officers, and the checks can be sent to them and the money can be paid out by them upon proof of identity, as the Government is doing to-day in other cases; so that there will be no inconvenience from that source.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the suggestion which has been made by the Senator from Missouri is one which relieves the pressure of some arguments which have been urged against this bill. The Government can employ all the known agencies with which it is familiar to prevent middlemen and claim agents from swallowing up and devouring the small sums which are intended for its beneficiaries. With such guards it seems to me that the bill ought to be enacted into a law and that justice—already too tardy—ought to be done this humble class of citizens who trusted in the faith of the Government and who have patiently awaited the day when it might be disposed to recognize and to pay their claims.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, can I call for the regular order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can do so.

Mr. PLATT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the amendment my colleague proposed be printed.

Mr. TELLER. Let all the amendments be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw the call for the regular order until the Senator from Ohio, who has charge of the bill which is under consideration, returns to the Chamber. He will be here in a moment.

Mr. STEWART. It will certainly take a long time to dispose of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business was passed over subject to objection, and the discussion upon the bill that was called up in the morning hour was continued by unanimous consent. The Chair understands the Senator from Connecticut now to call for the regular order.

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That being in accordance with the unanimous agreement, the regular order will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I then move to proceed to the consideration of the Freedman's Bank bill.

Mr. TELLER and others. Do not do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to get the bill out of the way.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to let the bill lie over. It would probably save a good deal of discussion to take that course.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will never call the bill up again. It has passed the Senate twice unanimously; it has been reported by the Committee on Finance twice or three times. It has been upon the Calendar. It has been discussed and every word has been studied and conned over again and again. If it is met with amendments about legal heirs, legal representatives, and the question whether certain people were married regularly down South at certain times, it is hardly worth while to keep it up, it seems to me. We all want to pass it. There is not a member of the Senate——

Mr. COCKRELL. I beg the Senator not to include all Senators in his statement. There are some here who have just as independent views about this measure as the Senator from Ohio, and I am one of them. I think it is a great outrage upon the tax-payers of the United States that they should be called upon to reimburse this money, and I propose to give my views upon the question. I should think the men who traveled around through the South and represented that they were the Government of the United States could do no act to bind the tax-payers of this country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to press the bill against the pending business, but if the Senator from Missouri will get up and make his opposition to it, make his speeches ever so strong, and let us take a vote upon it, there will be an end of it. What is the proposition now, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order has been called for by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. May I be permitted to say a word in explanation of my call for the regular order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator from Connecticut will be permitted to proceed.

Mr. PLATT. The regular business which was before the Senate yesterday, the important business which is the special order as soon as the unfinished business is disposed of, and further important business which I hope to have considered when these two subjects are disposed of, seem to justify me in asking that after 2 o'clock, at least, the Senate shall pay attention to the regular business which comes up at that time. I wish this bill to pass, but these important measures are being postponed from day to day just by the operation of taking up something in the morning hour, and then making it the unfinished business to the displacement of everything else, either actually or constructively; and I feel that I ought to insist upon the regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Missouri whether he desires further time in order to express his views?

Mr. COCKRELL. I intend to make a short speech on this question, and I think there will be others who will wish to do so. I think it will be an economy of time to let the bill go over.

Mr. PLATT. The bill can be taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I shall not insist upon going on with the bill, although I do hope that the Senate will vote finally upon the bill when it comes up again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. May I inquire whether the amendments are to be printed? I made a motion to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendments will be printed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I want to vote for the bill if the amendments will conform to what I understand to be the object and purpose of the bill, and I hope to receive the assent of the Senate to print the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

Mr. VEST. If the bill goes over, I offer an amendment in order that it may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri presents an amendment for the purpose of having it printed. It will be so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 2d instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 309) for the relief of R. G. Huston & Co.; and

An act (S. 643) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Corinth, Miss.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BLAIR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8004) authorizing the issue of fractional silver certificates; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

DENVER AND RIO GRANDE RAILROAD.

Mr. TELLER. This morning the bill (H. R. 1262) granting the right of way to the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad through the Fort Crawford military reservation, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I desire to have that order vacated, and have the bill lie on the table.

The same bill has passed the Senate practically, and I shall call it up at some future time. It is not necessary to have the House bill referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the reference will be reconsidered, and the bill will lie on the table.

Mr. TELLER. I do not ask to take it up now.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1956) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Gros Ventre, Piegan, Blood, Blackfeet, and River Crow Indians in Montana, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PEEL, Mr. HARE, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 81) to authorize the purchase of the lands necessary for the construction of locks and dams on the Cumberland River, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BLANCHARD, Mr. STEWART of Texas, and Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina the managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PURCHASE OF BONDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5034) to provide for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. STEWART. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following additional section:

SEC. 2. That whenever the circulation, or any portion thereof, of any national bank, not in liquidation, shall be surrendered, by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury or otherwise, and the same, or an equivalent amount, is not taken by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, at the market price thereof, an equivalent amount in silver bullion in excess of the minimum of two million dollars' worth per month for coinage purposes, which shall be coined and used as provided in the act passed February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and restore its legal-tender character:" Provided, That nothing in this act shall alter or repeal said act of February 28, 1878.

Mr. FRYE. I was necessarily absent yesterday part of the time when this matter was under consideration, and I have lost its status. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] was about to offer an amendment as I went out of the Chamber. Has that amendment been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was adopted.

Mr. FRYE. It was adopted as a substitute for the original bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that to have been the effect of the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Then the pending amendment is an amendment to the substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the state of the case.

Mr. GEORGE. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin has not been agreed to by the Senate? It was only adopted as in Committee of the Whole?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate, and the question is upon concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to which the Senator from Kentucky has offered an amendment, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, yesterday when this bill was under discussion I find by looking at the RECORD a statement that I did not exactly hear at the time, because the general condition of the Senate is such that nobody hears anything unless he sits next to the speaker. That seems to have been for some time the normal condition of this body. I find by looking at the RECORD that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], in speaking upon this question, used the following language:

> And now it is proposed to issue more than $4,000,000 per month additional to that now coined. In other words, if the 4½ per cent. bonds should be surrendered and purchased by the Government, and $85,000,000 of currency, for which the 4½ per cent. bonds are held as security, should be redeemed, then 85,000,000 of silver dollars must immediately be coined in addition to those now required to be coined. I wish to say in relation to that, if the Treasury of the United States within sixty days after that is done is not upon a silver basis pure and simple, and if gold is not at a premium, then all financial instruction we have had in the past is at fault.

I suppose when the Senator from New Jersey spoke of the "financial instruction" that must be at fault he referred to the financial instruction that had come from the opponents of silver in the Senate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator let me correct the word now? I should have said "experience," but I sometimes use words very carelessly.

Mr. TELLER. I am not now acquainted with what the Senator has just said. I could not hear him.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the Senator will bear with me, I find often that I am somewhat careless in the use of words when speaking extemporaneously in the Senate. Although I suppose my language was correctly reported, certainly the word "instruction" should have been "experience." The latter word would have been more fitting.

Mr. TELLER. So the Senator desires to change his statement and make it read, "then all financial experience we have had in the past is at fault." I will accept it in that way, and I think that I can show in a very few moments, not intending to take much of the time of the Senate, that our financial experience has been entirely different from what the Senator supposes.

I find also a statement made the day before by the Senator from New Jersey. In speaking of the coinage of silver he said: "We have coined more than all the rest of the world combined." I thought that probably the Senator had got that statement where he got the rest of his financial instruction, for it is equally faulty, as I shall show before I get through.

I understood the Senator also to complain the other day (and I endeavored to interrupt him without much success) that there was trouble with the import duties; that they come in silver certificates to such an extent as to embarrass the Department charged with the collection of the revenues of the country. I know that that has been charged repeatedly, but it is not true. I hold before me now a statement from the Treasury Department showing the percentage of gold and silver coin, of gold certificates, silver certificates, and United States notes received since the 1st day of January, 1887, monthly, from customs in New York, where, of course, the great bulk of our customs is collected. I find that at no time since that date have silver certificates been received in the payment of important duties in excess of 7 per cent. of the total amount collected—I mean on any one day or any two or three days' average. The average has been anywhere from 7 to 2 per cent., and 7 per cent. occurred only once in all the figures in that time. I find that on January 10, 1887, when there were 7 per cent. of silver coin certificates received, there were 69.3 per cent. of gold certificates received on the same day. I find that on the 31st day of March, 1888, there were 78.7 per cent. of gold certificates received and 4 per cent. of silver certificates, and the statement is that eleven days before, on the 20th of March, there were 79.1 per cent. of gold certificates received and 8 per cent. of silver certificates. At the same time, on the day I have mentioned, there was something over 11 per cent. received of greenbacks.

In other words, this statement shows that silver coin and silver certificates compose the least part of the import duties collected in the city of New York. Therefore it can not be said that the Department is embarrassed by the collection of import duties in either silver or silver certificates, for the amount received is inconsequential as to both silver certificates and silver coin.

The Senator from New Jersey said that the silver certificates went into the subtreasury at New York, and were immediately returned here. That is very proper. When they are sent out, why should they not come back? Thus they go back and forth. The silver certificate does only what the greenback does, but not to the same extent; it does not get into the Treasury for the payment of duties in an amount equal to the greenback.

The Senator from New Jersey said that if we pass this bill as now proposed to be amended we shall be on a silver basis within sixty days, for $85,000,000 would be coined in addition to the present coinage of silver. The Senator corrected himself yesterday, under the advice of the Senator from Kentucky, by saying that there could not be to exceed $69,000,000 coined under any circumstances if the entire surrender of that class of bonds should be made.

It can not be supposed by anybody that this surrender of bonds is to be made all at once. They are to come in gradually, and this money is to be paid out gradually. It is to be added to the circulating medium by degrees, and not in haste.

I repeat, there is not anything in the experience of this country or in the experience of the world that will justify any man in saying that $250,000,000 of silver in this country put on the market to-day would make any difference between the value of the silver dollar at present and the value of the silver dollar then. The Senator himself said in debate yesterday that there was no cheap dollar. He admitted that. We heard the silver dollar of 412½ grains for years called a cheap dollar, but the Senator admitted that it was not a cheap dollar. Why? Because it is exchangeable for everything that a gold dollar is exchangeable for in equal quantities.

When the Senator was discussing this question day before yesterday he talked about the silver dollar being intrinsically worth only 70 cents. It is intrinsically worth as much as the gold dollar. What does the Senator mean by the term "intrinsically worth?" Does he mean that it is not the value of the silver of itself or the gold of itself? "Intrinsically worth" means absolutely nothing in the theory of finance. When applied as it should be applied the term means that the article has the capability of being exchanged for something else, and when anything can be exchanged in equal quantities for another thing the two things are equal. Thus, when you can buy as much wheat or as much corn for a silver dollar as you can for a gold dollar, by a well-known rule that we learned when we were students at school, two things being equal to the same thing are equal to each other. They being capable of being exchanged for the same identical things, paying the same debts, discharging the same obligations, it can not be said that one is intrinsically less valuable than the other.

But, the Senator will say, you can not take your 412½ grains of silver and go to England and buy gold with it, as you once could. However, that can be done upon more than one-half of this great globe. You can go to India to-day with your silver and buy more or as many products in India as you could before the so-called fall. The intrinsic value of silver can not be thus measured. I know that in 1859, when silver was at a premium, you could buy corn in some of the Western States for 10 cents a bushel, and to-day corn in one of those same States and in the same town and in the same place is worth 60 cents a bushel. So silver could buy more corn then. Why? Because of the difference in price of the article with which it is to compete, and that is the only reason. The rupee will buy as much wheat in India to-day as it would buy in 1859. Therefore, if you give the proper definition to the term, "intrinsic value" means capability of being exchanged for something else, and you can not say because a coin will not buy just as much in this country as it did formerly that its intrinsic value is less than it was before.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Colorado if he recognizes the fact that there is such a thing as intrinsic value as applied to any commodity or to money?

Mr. TELLER. No, I do not; and that is the great fallacy of the whole argument.

Mr. STEWART. As I understand the term "value," as applied to money or any merchantable article, it consists not in intrinsic quality at all, but it depends upon the desire of man. That is the limitation.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with the Senator from Nevada. There can be no intrinsic value in money, whether it be gold or whether it be silver or whether it be paper. It might with some propriety be said that corn and wheat and oats and things that sustain human life might have intrinsic value, but that can not be said of gold and silver. It is a misuse of terms to speak of its intrinsic value. It has a value to correspond with its ability to absorb other things that people want. When a transaction is made between two people by which one man gets something that another one has, the buyer closes and limits that obligation by the tender of either silver or gold, if he has it, and if he has it not he tenders something else. It has no intrinsic value.

While silver to-day will not buy gold in equal quantities to what it did in 1859, yet, as I said the other day, and it is not to be questioned here or elsewhere, with rare exceptions (and those exceptions have nothing whatever to do with the character of the money) silver will buy as much as it ever would buy in the history of this country for the last hundred years. Its purchasing power is as great, compared with other things, as it ever has been, except as to gold, and the difference in the price, of which I might speak if I had time, is entirely owing to things outside of the question of the value of silver.

Mr. President, what has been the modern history of the world with reference to this question? The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] yesterday showed us, as I had attempted to do on a former occasion, from the records of this Government, that we have four times as much money in this country now as we had in 1877, just previous to the passage of the Bland bill; and it was then that the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Ohio, the latter being at that time a Cabinet officer, and others of the same class, told us that if we remonetized silver even in that imperfect way, we should drive all the gold out of the country. We were pointed to England as the nation that should be our exemplar on all questions of finance. We were told that England had adopted the gold standard, and that therefore we ought to adopt it.

I have taken a little pains to see what Great Britain has been doing with reference to gold, and how she, under her monometallic gold system, has been accumulating money, the only money she recognizes except the token silver money. From 1858 to 1865 the net imports of gold into Great Britain were £29,658,000; from 1865 to 1875 they were £50,108,000, or a total of £79,766,000. That was up to the time when this disturbance began about silver. In round numbers that would be $398,000,000. We may say that $398,000,000 had been the net import of gold into Great Britain in about seventeen years.

While we have been doubling up and quadrupling our gold, what has Great Britain been doing? Has she been adding to her hoard of gold? Has any country been adding to its hoard of gold except Germany, France, and the United States? From 1876 to 1885, including that year, the net exports of gold were £865,000; in 1886 they were £342,000. Thus from 1876 to 1886 England had lost £1,207,000, or $6,000,000 of gold, having $6,000,000 less gold now in her coffers and among her people than she had in 1875, while we have more than four times as much as we had in 1875.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether he does not recognize the fact that the balance of trade may have something to do with the accumulation or the loss of gold?

Mr. TELLER. I have not any doubt about that. I have not any question about the balance of trade being decidedly in our favor and assisting us in bringing gold to this country; but that was not the point. The point was whether this financial policy would not destroy the balance of trade. That is what we were told. We were told it would render it impossible for us to do business in such a way as to bring from all the ends of the earth the gold that we had been bringing. We were told that if any money came here at all it would be silver, and silver alone, and we should be upon a silver basis. I will not say that anybody fixed the time then quite so soon as the Senator from New Jersey has now done; that is, within sixty days; but we were told that within a short time we should be upon a silver basis. All the prophets of this body and the banks and the boards of trade in the great cities made the same prophecy. This experience ought to be sufficient to demonstrate that our position then was right, and yet we hear in the Senate from the Senator from Ohio and from the Senator from New Jersey the same old stale story. Right from the people who demand, as they have a right to demand, simply that the circulating medium of this country shall be kept up, we are to be told if we do not submit we are to be upon a silver basis. I repeat there is nothing in the experience, if there has been in the instructions of which the Senator from New Jersey was supposed to speak, that justifies this statement.

The Senator from New Jersey made one other statement which shows how ill-advised he is upon this matter. I say with all due deference and with no desire to say that which will be considered harsh that the great trouble of the people who stand and threaten and prophesy is not that they lack honesty, but that they are ignorant. The men who have attempted to instruct the American people upon this subject for fifteen years have never studied the A B C of the science of finance. Whether that assertion is applied to the Executive or to the prophets on this floor, it is true. Men who gave not an hour's attention to it previous to their induction into office immediately assume to lecture men who have given a life-long study to the question, and tell them what would be the effect of this or that class of legislation. So I say, with no desire to injure any man's feelings or to be abrupt or cruel, the fact is that we are suffering from the ignorance of the self-constituted guardians of the finances of this country.

We are told that we have coined more than the rest of the world combined of silver coinage. There is not any doubt but that the Senator from New Jersey supposed that to be a correct statement, and yet if he had gone to the records of his own Government, if he had gone to the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the reports of the Director of the Mint, or to the report of any official who deals with this subject, he would have found at least that there was an estimate that they put out as worthy of confidence and belief, showing that in 1881 there was $108,010,068 of silver money coined, and that in 1882 there was $110,785,934 of silver money coined.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Would it interfere with the Senator's argument if I should interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. Not the slightest, if the Senator wishes to ask a question; but I do not care about the Senator making a speech in the middle of mine.

Mr. MCPHERSON. From the best information I can gain by conference with the Senator from Colorado and other gentlemen upon the floor who represent the silver interests and are supposed and known to be very much acquainted with the amount of silver which has been the product of the mines of the world during the past year, the amount is about $100,000,000.

Mr. STEWART. It is about $100,000,000.

Mr. MCPHERSON. That is now reiterated by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. I am aware that the reports make it a little more than that; but I am aware how the reports are obtained. The reports as to gold and silver, to my own personal knowledge, are exaggerated in almost every case.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech made the other day on the floor by the Senator from Colorado, in which he informed the Senate that we had coined during the past year thirty-three million of standard silver dollars. He proceeded further to state that the amount taken and used in the arts during the past year was about $35,000,000. The Senator in the same breath tells us that the entire product of the mines of the world is about $100,000,000. Certainly if those statements are all true it leaves but about $35,000,000 more for the coinage of all the rest of the world. The Senator knows full well that the silver coinage of most countries is full and has been for years. He knows that there is but little coinage of the equivalent of the silver dollar among other nations. Some of them have restricted it; others have absolutely abandoned the coinage of silver and closed their mints against it. According to the Senator's own statement and the information he has given me I wish to know now if I am very far wrong in that statement. Further than that, will the Senator make a computation of the entire silver coinage of the world during the year 1887, and then tell me whether he is correct or myself.

Mr. TELLER. I will come to that presently. I am not without the proper data. When I come to discuss this question I do not do it upon any outside statement that somebody makes to me; I look up the matter for myself. If I do not understand it, it is simply because I have not the capacity, for I have the facts before me.

I was proceeding to give the Senator the information that he wanted, or rather which I do not think he did want, and which I do not think any of those people want who are opposed to silver. I was trying to give him some cold facts. I would a good deal rather have cold facts than theories. I would a good deal rather have official statements than prophesies upon a question of this kind. I had given the silver coinage of 1882, and now I will give him the coinage of silver in 1883. The amount in 1883 was $109,306,705. That is the coinage of the world, remember. That includes some recoinage, of which I will speak further on. In 1884 the amount of silver coinage was $90,059,443. In 1885 the amount is variously estimated from $96,554,470 to $105,705,299. It is estimated at $105,000,000 by our officials here, and at $96,000,000 by some other authorities. In 1886 there was coined in the world, if the Director of the Mint is not incorrect, $124,000,000. I wish to say here that so correct has been the Director of the Mint that it was certified before the English commission that the United States statistics were the best and most reliable statistics in the world; that they could be relied upon with greater accuracy than the statistics of any other country. The Director of the Mint states that in 1886 there were $124,000,000 coined. Of that amount a little less than $14,000,000 was recoinage, showing an absolute coinage of new silver of $110,000,000. Nobody in the world that I have ever heard of, either here or elsewhere, has estimated the production of silver at more than $130,000,000 for the year 1886. There is no publication that I know of giving the coinage of 1887. That I might be fortified at least by the opinion of those who have examined this matter as to 1887, I telegraphed this morning to the Director of the Mint for estimates that he had made for 1887 for the coinage of the world. He replies:

No estimate has been made of world's coinage for 1887. Probably not materially different from that of 1886, for which year it amounted to $124,000,000 coining value.

I say to the Senator from New Jersey that he is not quite correct when he says that with our $34,000,000, including fractional coin, we have coined more than all the rest of the world. It will be seen that we have coined less than a third of all the coinage of the world.

Mr. President, these are not guesses. There is some issue of silver in Asia that can not be accounted for. It is difficult to say what the coinage may be in some of the half-civilized regions of the earth, but I have given the coinage of the nations that are engaged in commerce. This is the coinage of the commercial world, including India and other regions where silver is used. The three countries that have coined the most silver are the United States, Mexico, and India. Their coinage comprises the great bulk of it. In the report of the Director of the Mint, as transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, we have the coinage of all the countries given, the coinage of the United States, of Mexico, of Bolivia, of the Argentine Republic, and so on, running down through. I will not read the figures and thus encumber the RECORD with what is immaterial.

I will just call attention to what India coined in 1882. India coined more than $29,000,000. The United States coined nearly $28,000,000 that year. In 1883 India coined $25,000,000. The next year she coined but $14,000,000, and in 1885 she coined only about $20,000,000.

Not only can the Senator find in this report how much coinage there was in the world, but he can find an estimate made with great care of all the coinage that has been made in the different countries for nearly the last hundred years. So we are not left to guess where the silver is. When we talk about this question and say there is not enough silver in the world to overwhelm us, we are not making prophecies or guesses. We have the documents to prove our assertion, and documents that are recognized both in this country and in Europe as worthy of credence and belief.

The Senator from New Jersey inquires if there are only $130,000,000 of silver at the outside produced—and we say there is less—how this coinage can go on. There is always, to some small extent, a little gold or a little silver hid away that may come out when there is a demand for it, and so there will always be a little more or a little less coined each year; but the coinage will not depend upon the production; it will depend upon other circumstances.

I have thought it well in this connection to submit to the Senate, that it may go into the RECORD, a statement of the coinage of gold during the same time that I have given the coinage of silver.

In 1881 the world coined $147,015,275 of gold; in 1882, $99,697,170; in 1883, $104,845,114; in 1884, $99,459,240; in 1885, $94,573,328, and in 1886, $92,633,400. I will state to the Senate that there is no estimate yet made in this country, or anywhere else that I am aware of, as to the coinage of 1887.

The Senator from New Jersey asks me as to the amount of our own coinage last year, the data of which are of course accessible. The coinage of the fiscal year consists of so many pieces and value, etc. The gold coinage consists of various pieces of the value of $22,293,279. That is for the year. I think in the year 1881—my memorandum does not seem to be where I can put my hand on it—when the total gold coinage of the world was a little more than $100,000,000, we coined $96,000,000 of gold. Notwithstanding the Bland bill, notwithstanding we were to be on a silver basis, we coined almost the total coinage of the world, or over two-thirds of it, in the year I have given, and I think it was the year 1881, although I have mislaid the memorandum for the moment.

Now I will go back to the coinage of silver in 1887. The silver coinage consisted of so many pieces of the total value of $34,366,483.75, of which $33,226,831 were in silver dollars, executed principally at the mints of Philadelphia and New Orleans. If the Senator from New Jersey had been told in the beginning of the fiscal year 1887 that there was to be added somewhere in the neighborhood of $9,000,000 more than the smallest limit provided by the act of 1878, he would have thrown up his hands in horror and would have declared, "Why, if this is done you will be on a silver basis." Yet that was done quietly by the Department, without any fright on the part of anybody. What has been the result? I hold before me the last statement of the Treasury Department on this subject, showing the amount of gold on hand and the amount of silver and silver certificates. I find that there are $191,526,445 of silver certificates in this country issued upon silver dollars. There are one hundred and ninety-one million and a half dollars of silver certificates, and we were told that when we had got $75,000,000 of certificates we had reached the limit; that it was not safe to go further with reference to the finances of the country, and at all events if the finances survived the morality of the country would be destroyed by the issue of another dollar.

In addition to these silver certificates we have $59,318,515 of silver coin doing duty as money. While on the last day of July, 1886, we had $93,959,880 of silver money in the Treasury of the United States not covered by certificates, we now have only $40,510,000 of money of that kind. That is the number of silver dollars not covered by certificates. We started July 1, 1886, with almost $94,000,000. We have coined $2,000,000 a month every month since, and sometimes two and a half million dollars, and yet we have reduced the silver in the Treasury of the United States, and we have put out more silver than we have coined, and nobody, save he be a banker somewhere, has been heard to raise his voice against inflation by silver certificates or by silver dollars.

The other day, when I made some remarks on this subject, I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that we had then about $309,557,826 of gold in the Treasury. Now we have $310,772,202 in the Treasury, and the gold certificates, which were then $93,097,913, are now $91,953,949.

The last statement shows that the gold in the Treasury belonging to the United States and not covered by the certificates is $218,818,252.63; so from the 20th of March to the 31st day of March there accumulated in the Treasury the difference between $216,470, 592.63 and $218,818,253.63, or very nearly two millions and a half in ten days, and that, too, in the face of a coinage of two and a half millions a month and more of this despised silver dollar. And yet the Senator from New Jersey tells us that our experience must teach all men that the coinage of a million dollars (for that is the most that can be expected in addition to the present amount) will bring us to a silver basis in sixty days. I say again these repeated assertions are denied by the facts and by the history, and it is but charitable to suppose they are made on this floor in ignorance and not malevolently by men who do not study this question and who ought not to speak upon it unless they so do.

The people of the United States take their views on such questions by what is said on this floor and what is said by the Executive Department charged with these questions; and when these statements, without a particle of fact backing them, are made, it is not strange that people who have not time to investigate these questions should believe that they are true. Many and many a man in the United States, ignorant of what is his interest, stands with those who are in favor of destroying the very property that he owns in the interest not of the great masses, not in the interest of the people who toil, but in the interest of the men who have accumulated money and who live by taking toll from others.

This is a question that has been agitated and discussed not for a few years, but for many. The learning upon this subject is beyond the capacity of any man almost, and no man can profess to know what has been written and said about it unless he has given hours and weeks and months and years of study to it; and when you find that class of men, as you do in Europe, with rare exceptions they speak in the same tones as we do when we say that the interest of the whole commercial world is wrapped up in the use of the two money metals.

I propose to submit here, not caring to read it, what I find in the last report of the English royal commission, the statement put in by M. Emile de Laveleye, professor of political economy at the University of Liege. I will put his statement against any man living on this continent. I will venture that there is not a man who will stand up here and pretend that he has given the same thought, the same attention that this learned professor has to this question for many years, and I propose to put in the RECORD, if I am allowed to do so without reading, his statement upon this subject, both as to the rise and fall of silver and as to the necessity of its use as money in order that the business of the world may go on, and I suggest to some of the Senators, who speak upon this subject so readily that they read what he says. I will not read the statement unless there is objection to my putting it in the RECORD without reading.

The statement of Professor de Laveleye is as follows:

M. EMILE DE LAVELEYE, PROFESSOR OF POLITICAL ECONOMY AT THE UNIVERSITY OF LIEGE.

I. To what do you attribute the fall in the value of silver, as compared with gold, since 1874?

It is perfectly evident that the fall in the value of silver, as compared to gold, is entirely due to the legislative measures that have been adopted by different states, i. e., firstly, the adoption of the gold instead of the silver standard by Germany and the Scandinavian states, and, secondly, the suspension of the coinage of silver by the Latin Union, to begin with, and afterwards by all other countries save India and the United States.

If the coinage of silver had not been abandoned this metal would not have lost in value through increase in its production. As all silver now produced finds ready employment, and no stock of it accumulates anywhere, is it not quite clear that had the mints of Germany, of the Latin Union, and of America been kept open they would very easily have absorbed the surplus production? As a kilogram of silver will always fetch 200 francs in standard money at the Paris mint, it is quite certain that the price of silver would have maintained itself at about 60½d. per ounce, precisely as during the time that the bimetallic system was in vigor in France.

II. What probability is there of a continuance of the fall?

Will the fall in the value of silver continue? That depends on America. If the Bland bill is repealed a fresh fall is inevitable.

III. To what do you attribute the fall in the wholesale prices of many commodities which has been in progress during the last ten or twelve years?

The fall of the price of certain commodities is due to the increase of their production, to improved facilities for transport, to the advance made in machinery, and to a general amelioration in all modes of fabrication and manufacture; but a universal fall in prices affecting all produce, even that which is in no way touched by the aforementioned causes, can only be explained by a general reason, and this general reason must necessarily be monetary contraction.

Indeed, simple common sense alone would solve the question. Between the years 1850 and 1870 all prices rose, and economists agree in attributing this rise to an increase in the production of gold. Since 1873 just the contrary has occurred. The production of gold has steadily diminished and silver is no longer allowed to make up the deficiency; a fact wholly without precedent in economic history. The coinage of moneys, so active formerly, has now almost ceased, while at the same time the exchanges effected are far more numerous than they used to be. All economists without exception teach that when cash diminishes, cæteris paribus, prices fall, and it is quite certain that since 1873 the stock of gold in Europe has immensely decreased, partly from the exports of gold to America and partly also because industry is ever absorbing a portion of the monetary stock.

The present production of gold is clearly insufficient. It is estimated to be about £18,000,000 or £19,000,000 annually. According to Burchard's and Soetbeer's very careful statistics, trade yearly absorbs about £12,000,000 in gold, due allowance being made for remelting. The extreme East has of late years taken about £4,000,000. The losses from wear and tear, shipwrecks, hidden treasures, and such like, amount to at least another £1,000,000. There remains, therefore, at most two millions sterling to face the fresh demand for coin which the immense increase in exchanges all over the world gives rise to.

As population and business steadily increase in the two principal gold-producing countries, the United States and Australia, these keep for themselves all the precious metal they produce. In England, between 1879 and 1884, the gold coined amounted to £7,922,830. During the same period the coinage of gold in Australia was £24,112,000, and in the United States $231,000,000 (£46,000,000). The coinage of gold in the States exceeded the production by $150,000,000, and this excess was of course supplied by gold from the outside world.

The consumption by trade, combined with the monetary requirements, more especially if the Bland bill were repealed, would absorb all the gold produced in America, and the more so that this demand would be ever steadily increasing owing to the rapid growth both of population and riches.

It would be the same in Australia and in the extreme East. Europe would, therefore, have only Russia to look to in the future for her provisions of gold.

At the present moment all European countries, with the sole exception of France, have not sufficient gold in circulation. In England, indeed, this scarcity is an acknowledged fact. "Ten years ago," says the Economist, "the disposal of the London stock exchange was estimated by a competent authority to be about £4,000,000. At the present time it is far below that; when a demand for a million of gold absolutely carries off this sum from the market, and detains it elsewhere, there is a sensible pressure on the exchange." (Economist, February 4, 1869.) This strange state of things to which the Economist here refers was again perceptible this autumn (1887), and is still felt while I write these lines.

Italy has already lost a considerable portion of the gold which she procured at such heavy cost when payments in cash were recommended there. Gold is everywhere at a premium, from 2 to 4 per thousand in Paris and in Belgium, even at 8 at this moment (October, 1887), from 2 to 3 per cent. in Spain, from 16 to 18 per cent. in Roumania. Holland, though a very rich country, has scarcely any gold in circulation, payments being effected in either silver or notes. Germany is lacking in gold to complete her monetary reforms, and Austria and Russia and all Eastern Europe have no gold in circulation. The scarcity of gold is indeed an undeniable fact, observable on all sides at the present time, and destined to become more and more apparent.

It may be objected that gold is not yet absolutely wanting; this is true to a certain extent, because as prices fall when gold becomes scarce the quantity of money always appears sufficient.

This is a special economic phenomenon. It may be maintained that there will always be a sufficient supply of gold, because all prices fall when the means of exchange are diminishing, and therefore a greater number of exchanges can be effected with a less supply of gold. Theoretically, cash might be reduced to a minimum, and it would still suffice, because prices would fall proportionately. And, indeed, the less plentiful it is, the more abundant would it appear, for, as the lowering prices would render all business slack, the non-employed capital would be deposited in banks. This has been the case during the last few years.

It is very easy to prove beyond a doubt that the marked and universal fall in prices is not due solely to an increase of production and to improved methods of transport. Between 1850 and 1870 the railway development and the application of steam made greater progress than during the last ten years; new inventions of all kinds in the industrial world rapidly succeeded each other, and yet during that time production immensely increased and prices rose. Between 1870 and 1885 economic progress was also considerable, but less than during the previous period, and nevertheless prices fell to a lower level than in 1850. How, then, can it be denied that monetary contraction was the cause of this? According to Mr. Sauerbeck, production in England between 1850 and 1870 increased 2¼ per annum, and between 1870 and 1885 1⅛ only, while prices rose during the first-mentioned period from 18 to 20 per cent. and fell during the second 30 per cent.

IV. Has it (the fall in prices) extended to (a) retail prices, (b) wages and other payments for services rendered, (c) land and houses?

The fall in prices has been general, but wages have not been so much affected for the motives already indicated by Adam Smith.

V. Has the fall resulted in any material prejudice to the commercial or general interests of the world?

In theory it is unimportant whether prices are high or low, but practically a fall affects all long-standing creditors, companies, shareholders, and holders of mortgages, and benefits people with fixed revenues; or, in other words, as Stuart Mill puts it, the active portion of society lose and the non-active are gainers; but the effects of the fall while it is actually taking place are still more serious. All transactions and enterprises payable at fixed terms are exposed to an inevitable loss, and this is most discouraging to public initiative. Hence the stagnation in business now observable. The capital put into the fresh undertakings started each year has diminished by one-half. The reverse takes place during a period of expansion; all prices rise; profits are therefore assured

Another serious drawback to the present situation is that as the ratio of value between gold and silver has become uncertain since the bimetallic system no longer exists in France, all commercial relations with countries where the silver standard is admitted are subjected to an alea which is most unfavorable to sound trade.

VI. Do you consider that the countries using the gold standard, or any of them, are suffering from an injurious contraction of the currency which might have been obviated or mitigated by an increase in the supply of gold?

Gold-standard countries also suffer to an equal degree from the evils hereabove referred to, and all this would have been avoided if silver had been allowed to fulfill, as formerly, the office of standard money. As gold alone has now to replace the two metals as far as coinage is concerned, all countries fight for it, and the total quantity existing is insufficient. Hence the struggle for gold now taking place. As M. Bismarck says, the blanket is not wide enough!

VII. To what extent and in what way are prices affected by the quantity of the metal or metals used as standards of value?

All economists agreed that price depends on the relation existing between the mass of articles to be exchanged and the amount of credit or metallic means of exchange, due allowance being made for the rapidity of circulation of these means.

VIII. What is the relation, if any, between the supply or quantity of the precious metals and the fluctuations of credit?

The amount of money does not determine the facility of credit. For instance, credit is more general in England than in France, although England has certainly one-half less than France; but taking into account the monetary situation of a country, the influx or exports of gold act momentarily on the rate of interest, because in order to maintain sufficient cash in hand banks must raise their rates of discount when gold is being absorbed elsewhere. For example, we know that the Bank of England regulates the rate of discount by the influx or drainage of gold, but the interest on capital is fixed by the abundance or scarcity of capital, not of money.

IX. Has there been during the last fifteen years any important development of the system of checks, bank credits, bills of exchange, or other means of economizing the use of the precious metals?

Mr. Robert Giffen is of opinion that during the last fifteen years there has been no great increase in the means of payment—checks, bank credits, and bank-notes, and I think he is right. The clearing-house operations have certainly diminished.

X. Do you consider that an international agreement could be made for the free coinage of gold and silver as legal-tender money at a fixed rate?

No one can question the possibility of an international agreement for the free coinage of gold and silver as legal-tender money at a fixed ratio.

XI. Is it in the power of governments to maintain such a ratio if agreed upon, and would the practice of the commercial world follow the law?

Governments would not impose the ratio they adopted, but the effect of their adoption of a certain ratio, let us say 15½ to 1, would be automatic and perfectly natural, and consequently it would impose itself upon the commercial world. If for one kilogram of silver nine-tenths fine I can obtain from the mints of the Latin Union 200 francs in standard coinage, and from the mints of all other states, England, Germany, and America, an equivalent amount, it is quite certain that I should not choose to sell it under this price. Silver would therefore maintain itself at its usual value of 60½ or 60⅞ per ounce, as during the seventy years when France alone had adopted bimetallism, without this country having once to attempt any interference as to its price or relative value. The self-acting result of the free coinage of the two metals is one of the least clearly understood sides of the problem.

XII. What would be the effect of such an agreement, if carried out, upon (a) prices, and (b) the production of the precious metals?

A treaty establishing international bimetallism would produce no immediate results on prices, for there is no great stock of gold or silver to flow into the mints; but it would stop their fall, and would insensibly be productive of a certain rise. As the price of silver would increase, its production would also increase a little.

XIII. Do you consider an international agreement, for bimetallism possible on any other ratio than 15½ to 1?

For the ratio between gold and silver it might, perhaps, be well to adopt the American 16 to 1, but the French 15½ has been in vigor so long that it seems almost to impose itself. It is the basis of all contracts between states of the Latin Union, and in Spain, Germany, and Holland, and all Eastern Europe. Besides, America would as readily adopt the 15½ ratio as the 16. And if the ratio were once established by international contract it would impose itself.

XIV. Failing an international bimetallic agreement, what measures could be adopted by the commercial nations of the world for giving increased stability to the relation between gold and silver?

Failing an international bimetallic agreement, I know of no measure which could give stability to the price of silver. If it can not be freely coined it becomes mere merchandise, subject like all other merchandise to varying and limitless changes in value.

XV. It is argued that, in the absence of bimetallism, the effect of any disturbance of the currency is limited to half the currencies of the world, and thereby increased in intensity. Do you consider this view correct? And, if so, do you think the evil a serious one?

The disturbances of the currency were produced by the proscription of silver, but they are not confined to certain countries. They affect all to a greater or less degree, because commercial relations are now such that the entire world forms one great market. The fall in prices has been universal, and has been productive everywhere of great suffering, ruin, and loss.

XVI. If the effect of such disturbances could be spread over all countries, would greater stability of the standard of value be secured thereby? If all the great commercial powers were to come to an international bimetallic agreement, sudden disturbances would no longer take place, and changes brought about by increased or diminished productions of the mines would be very gradual, almost insensible, as they would extend over such vast territory. After the year 1850 bimetallism in France, by assisting the absorption of about £260,000,000 in gold, prevented the too great depreciation of this metal and arrested the rise in prices. It acts like a parachute, and even such monometallists as Michel Chevalier and Jevons admit this.

Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate with any further remarks upon this subject. I want simply to give notice that the question of silver does not cut any particular figure on this bill, and the amount of silver that will be coined under the Beck amendment, as it is called, will be insignificant, and will have perhaps very little or no influence on the value of silver in this country; but the adoption of the provision will show that the great silver-producing country of the world, the richest country in the world, is satisfied that it did not make a mistake when it partially remonetized silver, and that step by step it proposes to go on until there shall be a complete recognition of silver as a money metal equal in all respects with gold.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. BECK to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I move, in line 4 of the amendment, if in order, to strike out "thirty" and insert "sixty" before "days."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment just read is an amendment in the second degree, and the motion of the Senator from Iowa, therefore, at this time is not in order.

Mr. ALLISON. After the pending amendment is adopted, will it then be in order to strike out and insert?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was amended in Committee of the Whole, and after the bill was reported to the Senate the question was on agreeing in the Senate to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] moved to amend the amendment by adding what has just been read, which was an amendment in the second degree, and upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The question now is, Whether the Senate will agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I appeal to the Senator from Kentucky, if my amendment is not in order, that he insert "sixty" instead of "thirty," in line 4 of his amendment. Thirty days is a very brief time for the taking up of circulation which may be surrendered.

Mr. BECK. I do not see that that would make very much difference one way or the other.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it would relate very much to the convenience of the officers who will have the administration of the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment now proposed by the Senator from Kentucky is in a form that is not amendable. I do not think that is exactly fair legislation. It seems to me that he ought to let the vote be taken first on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], let that be agreed to in the Senate, and then let the Senator from Kentucky offer his proposition so that it will be amendable. The reason—and I mention it in perfect good faith—is this: I should like to offer an amendment to carry out the idea I suggested in my remarks yesterday; that is, to allow the bullion to be purchased in the mode proposed by the Senator, but to allow that bullion to be placed in the Treasury without coinage, and certificates issued to the amount of the market value thereof. I can not offer that amendment now as the proposition stands. The Senator from Kentucky yesterday in his speech said that under the existing law the certificates can not issue upon bullion. I knew that, but I am not at liberty to offer an amendment to secure that, although I have an amendment prepared in five or six words that would enable me to present that question to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as it now stands, was of course offered fairly, but none of us here knew precisely what it was. We had been advised, not by him, but by others, that a joint resolution in that form would be offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, and I supposed at the time that it was a joint resolution or a concurrent resolution that he offered; and when it came in the form of an amendment to this bill we were quite taken by surprise, at least I was. Therefore, I moved to amend it as I have done, and I propose now, so far as I have any control over it, to ask the Senate to vote upon the amendment I have offered just as it stands, with the thirty days, without modifying it; and then if that is adopted, all well. If not, Senators can take what action they please.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to inquire, suppose the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky were not pending, if the Senate should concur in the amendment adopted in committee would that amendment then be amendable? I ask what the parliamentary condition would be as to the amendment if the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky was withdrawn and the Senate should agree to the amendment adopted yesterday as in Committee of the Whole. Would that be amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that the bill would still be open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. By amending the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By perfecting further amendments to the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. But the Chair will bear in mind that the bill consists of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the amendment is agreed to, it is no longer an amendment; it is the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Has not the bill been reported to the Senate? My impression is that it has been, and if so, it is an amendment not concurred in yet, but an amendment to which an amendment is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The inquiry of the Senator from Kansas was to another point.

Mr. PLUMB. Now I inquire a little further, if I may be permitted. Suppose the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment should be adopted, and then the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin should be concurred in as amended; would the bill then still be open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would.

Mr. ALLISON By adding to it, but not by striking out.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand, if the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is adopted you can not amend the text of that afterwards. You can add to it, but you can not change by any amendment the text of that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will decide all these questions when they arise.

Mr. FRYE. You can add new sections.

Mr. HARRIS. Sections may be added to the bill after the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is concurred in in the Senate, but you can not amend that language, as I understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

Mr. BECK. What is the vote?

Mr. CULLOM. On your amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole upon the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT (when the name of Mr. EDMUNDS was called). The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is absent, and wished me to state that he was paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. If present, the Senator from Vermont would vote against this amendment.

Mr. FRYE (when Mr. HALE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. HALE] is absent with a committee of the Senate. He is ordinarily paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], but he is on this bill paired with the Senator from Louisana [Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. Being satisfied that if he were here he would vote against this amendment while I should vote for it, I am not at liberty to vote. I withhold my vote because of the pair.

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. I would vote "yea" if he were present. I do not know what his vote would be.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], but understanding that if he was here he would vote for this proposition, I vote "yea."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], which is left to be determined by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

Mr. CULLOM. I am not aware how the Senator from Michigan would vote.

Mr. RANSOM. I should vote "yea," if at liberty to do so.

Mr. REAGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS]. If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. Understanding that if he were present he would vote for this amendment, I vote in the affirmative.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who is absent under the order of the Senate, but his colleague has voted "yea" upon this question; and as I am assured by him that Mr. MANDERSON would vote the same way, I record my vote "yea."

Mr. HEARST. I have been temporarily paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from California to withdraw his vote? The Senator's vote is recorded. Does he desire it withdrawn?

Mr. HEARST. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. BLODGETT] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER]. My colleague if present, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 13; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment? If it is, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding as a new section the following:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase and cancel the interest-bearing bonds of the United States with the $100,000,000 of gold now reserved in the Treasury for the redemption of the legal-tender notes of the United States.

And that the following words be stricken out of section 3 of the act of January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," to wit: "And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem in coin the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding, on their presentation for redemption at the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States, in the city of New York, in sums not exceeding $50."

And that the following words be stricken out of section 62 of the act of July 12, 1882, entitled "An act to enable national banking associations to extend their corporate existence, and for other purposes," to wit: "Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend the issue of such gold certificates whenever the amount of gold coin and gold bullion in the Treasury reserved for the redemption of United States notes falls below $100,000,000."

And said provisions of the act of January 14, 1875, and the act of July 12, 1882, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. FARWELL said: I desire to ask the offerer of the amendment, the Senator from Texas, whether it is the purpose of his amendment to suspend specie payments? That is the way I understand it.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. President, the House bill and the substitute for it which has been adopted by the Senate have for their object to reduce the surplus or unused money in the Treasury by applying it to the payment of the interest-bearing public debt, thus relieving the country to that extent of debt and of the payment of interest on the bonds that may be redeemed.

Mr. FARWELL. May I ask the Senator to answer my question, if he will.

Mr. REAGAN. My remarks will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. FARWELL. He can answer it in one word, "yes" or "no."

Mr. REAGAN. I prefer answering the question in my own way, if the Senator will allow me. The question in fact has no pertinency, as it seems to me, to the issue now presented.

Mr. President, if the object is as I have stated—and I suppose no one will doubt that that is the object of the proposed legislation—let me call attention to the fact that we have in the Treasury, held from year to year simply to fill a place in the column of assets and in the column of liabilities of the reports of the Secretaries of the Treasury, $100,000,000 of gold. It has remained there from year to year performing no other office than filling its place in the Treasury accounts, being held for the ostensible purpose of redeeming the $346,000,000 of outstanding legal-tender notes.

By the act of 1878, passed by Congress over the veto of President Hayes, it was determined that the law which had been previously passed requiring the redemption and cancellation of the legal-tender notes by the Secretary of the Treasury should be repealed and that those notes should thenceforward become, not a debt against the Government, but currency to aid in the commerce and industrial interests of the country—that they should perform the office of currency instead of being converted, as they would have been under the previous policy, into an interest-bearing bonded debt, imposing that much greater burden on the people than they have had to bear in consequence of the repeal of that law.

There is no one, I take it, who will contend that there is a need for this money for the redemption of the notes that are not required by law to be redeemed, and that no one desires should be redeemed, for they are more valuable in the commerce of the country in general use and more desired than the gold coin, if the people have the option as to which they will take.

It is true that there might, by possibility, be a few of the legal-tender notes presented for redemption; but if there should be there is no need of holding this $100,000,000 of gold in reserve to redeem the very few that might possibly be presented, especially in view of the fact that the receipts of the Treasury are, month by month and year by year, largely in excess of the expenditures of the Government, thus affording a reserve more than sufficient for the redemption of any of these legal-tender notes which are likely to come into the Treasury for redemption.

The difference between the Senator from Illinois and myself is that he desires the legal-tenders to be made an interest-bearing debt, and I suppose he would follow the logic of his position by desiring that they should become, instead of currency to aid the commerce and business interests of the country, a bonded debt to further burden the people and thereby to contract the volume of currency still more.

Mr. FARWELL. Do you pretend to say that the legal-tender notes are not a debt? Do they not on their face say that the United States promises to pay?

Mr. REAGAN. Technically they are a debt, but practically they are money. Technically they are a debt, but they are not the form of debt that interest-bearing bonds would be, which can not circulate as money, and which only constitute a burden upon the already overburdened tax-payers of this country.

There stands $100,000,000 of gold that has lain there idle in the Treasury from year to year, performing no office for the public good, which may be used to redeem nearly an equal amount of 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds and relieve the people from the annual payment of four or four and a half million dollars of interest. No class of the people can be injured by the adoption of this policy, but every interest of the country will be benefited by it.

First, it will reduce the debt; second, it will avoid the liability to four or four and a half million dollars interest a year; third, it would reduce the surplus in the Treasury; and last, and what is of infinitely more consequence, we should enlarge the circulation of the money in the country and aid its business interests and render any financial disaster improbable. If there should be any danger of pecuniary embarrassment or financial disaster, here is the easiest, the most direct, and it seems to me the most feasible road open to accomplish the purpose of taking this gold out of the Treasury, where it is doing no good, where it is performing no office except, as I said, to occupy a place in the reports of the assets and the credits in the Treasury Department from year to year.

Mr. DAWES. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator would have the greenback, which as issued has a promise to pay on the face of it, is never to be paid.

Mr. REAGAN. It is not necessary for me to answer a conundrum of that kind. My purpose is to deal with practical facts, with actualities, and not with speculative conundrums.

Mr. DAWES. Do you mean to say that you would deceive the public and defraud them; promise to pay and then never pay?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not mean that, Mr. President, but I mean very different from what the Senator from Massachusetts does. I mean that I would redeem the bonds, reduce the debt, relieve the people of the interest, and leave the greenbacks to be redeemed, if anybody chooses to send them in, by the use of the surplus in the Treasury. The Government is amply able to redeem them, amply able to redeem more than ten times all that are likely to be presented for redemption without touching the $100,000,000. So the Senator will see that his question is misleading.

If the Government had no other means for the redemption of legal-tender notes than this $100,000,000 in gold, then I admit the proposition I made would not be allowable; but there is a reserve, an increasing reserve, constantly accumulating from day to day and week to week and month to month throughout the year in the Treasury. If this Government should be placed in the position of a banking institution there would be a sufficient reserve. It seems to be the prevailing policy to so regard it, instead of regarding the Treasury as a place for collecting the revenues of the country and for the disbursement of what is necessary to carry on the Government. If we will regard it in the light of a banking institution requiring such a reserve, we have that reserve without this $100,000,000.

I know very well that so far as the bondholders and the national banks are concerned they desire to retain this $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury and all the other gold they can put there. The bondholders desire to reduce the volume of currency in order to increase the value of their bonds when compared with the property and the labor out of which they are paid. The banks desire to reduce the volume of the currency, whether in the form of gold or silver or legal-tender notes, in order that they may get a profit upon the issue and circulation of their notes to supply this deficiency so created; and when gentlemen discuss this question without having reference to these facts they misunderstand the subject.

I repeat, as I said the other day, in substance, that from 1869, when the act was passed taking away from the people of this country the right to pay the public indebtedness in legal-tender notes, to the day when in 1873 by another act they were denied the privilege of paying the public indebtedness in silver coin, the policy of the banks and the bondholders was a policy of oppression and of fraud upon the people. I think it has been demonstrated in the other House and proved in this that the bonds were, by the law that was passed, redeemable at any time the Government might choose to redeem them within thirty years, that such was the proper interpretation of that law as it passed the two Houses of Congress, but by some means the word "after" was put in instead of "for," so that the bonds should not be redeemed for thirty years after they were issued. In this way, by fraud, by class legislation in the interest of the money classes and against the interests of the people and of the Government, by a series of acts and a persistency of policy calculated to enrich by millions the few and to impoverish the many, we have been brought to the condition in which the country finds itself.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has alluded to what he says has been demonstrated in the other House and probably in this, that by a fraud a bill had been altered. He ought, in order to have the statement complete, to add to it that the Judiciary Committee of the other House, of which a Texas gentleman is chairman, have reported that no such thing was ever done.

Mr. REAGAN. If I have misstated the fact I will withdraw my statement with pleasure; but the statement of facts upon which my statement is predicated was made by a Senator on this floor, and by a Representative at the other end of the Capitol, giving a circumstantial statement of all the facts, and I did not know that their statements had been questioned, and I do not understand how it was that those who stated these facts could have been mistaken, but I take the Senator's word.

Mr. DAWES. The RECORD shows, I think, just what I have stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report shows that fact. The Senator from Massachusetts is correct. I have read the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House.

Mr. REAGAN. Very well, then, I withdraw the statement. If I am wrong I was misled by the statements I have just referred to; certainly in both Houses it was stated that the RECORD showed when the bill passed that the word "after" was not in it, and that there was a change in the enrolled bill in the archives which shows "for" was inserted there and afterwards stricken out.

I was nearly through with what I had to say when interrupted. There have been two distinct lines of policy in this country prevailing for a long time—one successful in running this Government distinctly in the interest of the classes at the expense of the prosperity of the mass of the American people, the other in favor of a Government that should protect and respect the rights of all alike, and give special privileges to none.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] the other day spoke of the high condition of prosperity of this country at this time as being unexampled. Mr. President, if the Senator meant that the bondholders were prosperous, if he meant that the national banks were prosperous, if he meant that the railroad corporations that have had their hundred million of acres of land and as many millions of dollars of money as subsidy were prosperous, if he meant that the protected manufacturers were prosperous, if he meant that the large holders of money and dealers in bonds and public securities were prosperous, I confess that his statement was correct; but if he meant that that prosperity extended to the millions of people who toil for the support of their families and of this Government, the great mass of the people, I tell him that he has not mixed with them and has not known their condition, their feelings, and their hopes as I know them, because go where you will in any part of the country in which I have been, and you find the middle and lower classes of the people oppressed by debt, oppressed by poverty, and scarcely able to make their earnings meet their year's expenses, scarcely able to pay their ordinary accounts without anything being left to meet contingencies.

This is so, in my opinion, among those classes everywhere, so that if the Senator meant that the people enriched by the policy of the party to which he belongs prosper he is all right; but if he means that the people whose resources have been drawn from them for the enrichment of these classes, and who constitute the great body of the Democracy of this country, then I submit that he is grievously mistaken.

But leaving that I recur to the question before the Senate. If our object is to reduce the surplus revenue in the Treasury, if our object is in doing this to extinguish as much as possible of the public debt, if our object is to relieve the people from the payment of interest, then the most easy, direct, and least injurious way in which we can do it, in my opinion, is by the adoption of the amendment which I have submitted to the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the bill as it now stands is a simple proposition to allow the Treasury Department to use the surplus money in the Treasury to buy bonds so as to restore that surplus to circulation and at the same time to take care that the present volume of currency is not contracted. The bill and the amendment provide that and nothing more. Now the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] presents an amendment in which a great many propositions are involved, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has given notice that he will bring up a measure that may involve weeks at least of debate before it is disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will not fall into an error, because, so far as I am concerned, I am indifferent about the resolution introduced by me, because the Senate having determined to go into these financial measures on this bill, I will not press the resolution. With the understanding that the bill should pass as it came from the other House, I was willing to postpone discussion for a week or so until these questions were considered in the Senate.

Mr. BECK. Very well. I only desire to say that the bill being in a perfectly simple form, merely to give authority for the use of the surplus money in the Treasury and to provide for any contraction by the banks, I am requested by gentlemen all around me to shorten the matter as much as possible by asking the Senator from Texas if he will not allow this amendment of his to remain until the bill of the Senator from Ohio comes up, as it will very soon, when all these questions can be discussed and examined, and not interfere with the progress now sought to be made by this simple proposition. That it will be the third measure to be considered, I suppose—to be taken up directly after two others are disposed of. Very little harm can come from the delay, and the proposition of the Senator from Texas now may delay the passage of this bill for so long a time and perhaps defeat the measure altogether, that I think we had better get this much done.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he thinks this amendment would be germane to the bill to which he refers?

Mr. BECK. I have not a doubt of it. It would be germane beyond all question.

Mr. HARRIS. Clearly so.

Mr. BECK. If I did not think so I would not make the suggestion.

Mr. REAGAN. As gentlemen, feeling as I do on the subject of this amendment, think it is better to pass the bill as now amended, without putting anything else upon it, and not because it is in accordance with my own judgment, but deferring to the judgment of the Senator from Kentucky and other gentlemen who agree with me, I will consent to the withdrawal of the amendment for the present with a view to offering it when the bill referred to comes up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have steadily voted against any amendment to this bill except the one proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], which, in the opinion of the Senate, accomplished in a better form the object proposed by the House of Representatives. I am opposed to and voted against the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] because, even from his own standpoint, it is faulty—faulty in this, that it provides, not directly for additional silver certificates, but only for an increase of the silver-dollar coinage beyond the amount which any Secretary of the Treasury of either party has thought proper to issue monthly. It is an extraneous question entirely, having no connection whatever with the purchase of bonds or the application of the surplus money in the Treasury. Therefore, although technically and in parliamentary law germane, it is not germane in the proper sense of the term to the bill now pending.

Besides, we have to take the amendment without the change of a word. It is not open to amendment. Whether so designed by the Senator from Kentucky or not, it is offered in a form where, and at a time when, it is not susceptible of amendment. For instance, I suggested (and I believe it met with the general concurrence of the Senate so far as I could see) that instead of coining more silver dollars, it would be better to place the bullion purchased under the operation of the Senator's amendment in the Treasury of the United States and issue silver certificates based upon the market value of that bullion. That was the proposition that I intended to submit and for which I would have voted; but as the bill now stands I can not under the rules of the Senate offer that amendment.

In order to test this I will submit my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the words "which shall be coined and used" and insert "and silver certificates shall be issued to an amount equal to the market value of such bullion;" so as to read:

That whenever the circulation, or any portion thereof, of any national bank not in liquidation shall be surrendered by the deposit of United States notes in the Treasury, or otherwise, and the same, or an equivalent amount, is not taken by other national banks within thirty days thereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to purchase, at the market price thereof, an equivalent amount in silver bullion in excess of the minimum of two million dollars' worth per month for coinage purposes, and silver certificates shall be issued to an amount equal to the market value of such bullion, as provided in the act passed February 28, 1878, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio propose that as an amendment to the amendment agreed to on motion of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that it can not be received.

Mr. BECK. I was about to raise that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment having been agreed to by the Senate can not be further changed in the present parliamentary stage.

Mr. SHERMAN. I stated that; and I offered the amendment to show that we are now compelled to act on this grave matter upon a proposition drawn by the Senator from Kentucky, no doubt after casual conference with gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber, which has not yet been carefully examined by any committee of this body; an amendment that, in my judgment, will meet with great opposition among the business men of the country, and now I can not offer the amendment that I propose or any other because, forsooth, he offered his amendment at such a stage of the proceeding as to be unamendable. I was perfectly conscious of that.

Mr. President, I do not intend to debate the merits of a proposition not before the Senate, because I am not in the habit of doing that.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] made a statement awhile ago about the funding law providing for the issue of 4 per cent. bonds, which has already been stamped out by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. That statement was entirely unfounded. The statement first began with the whisperings around in the Capitol. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and I then went and examined the original record, found the original bill, and found that the original proposition made in the House of Representatives was to issue 4 per cent. bonds payable after thirty years, and so the proposition continued until the end; but, finally, one of the engrossing clerks, in enrolling the bill from one of the reports of the committee of conference, instead of leaving in the words "redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years," inserted, by mistake no doubt—it could not have been otherwise, because there could be no motive for it—"for thirty years," instead of "after thirty years;" which would simply make them redeemable during the thirty years.

The idea of providing for a bond redeemable in the first thirty years and never redeemable afterwards, would not then or now receive the sanction of any man in the United States of America. It was simply an absurd proposition. It was found that the original bill as reported by General Schenck in the House of Representatives, he being then the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, provided for the payment of the bonds after thirty years at the pleasure of the United States, and so it went through until a clerk in making up the enrolled bill from a faulty copy of one of the reports of the committee of conference made this mistake, and out of this all this excitement grows. The House of Representatives, when it was called to their attention, properly examined into it, and, as I am informed—I have not seen the report—the Committee on the Judiciary of the House unanimously declared that it was a mistake in the enrolling clerk, which was immediately corrected before the bill was signed. These are the facts.

But the Senator from Texas said another thing in which there is some truth, that now there is a good deal of distress in this country. I do not deny it. There was no such distress before this Administration came into power, and I can trace many of these evils to the fact that we have an Administration in power that has not executed the law according to its plain letter and intent and according to the unanimous construction of the Senate of the United States.

Let us see how that was. When this Administration came into power we had $346,000,000 of greenback circulation in unchallenged credit in all the markets of the world. We had over $300,000,000 of national-bank notes absolutely secured beyond peradventure, and the system was going along smoothly and tranquilly. We had silver certificates based upon the silver dollars that had been issued. We had gold certificates amounting to one hundred and ninety-odd million dollars. We had a vast amount of currency of different kinds, and all perfectly well secured.

How is it now? The Democratic House of Representatives refused to make the change in the banking law proposed two or three years ago by the Finance Committee—reported by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] and passed by the Senate. If that change had been agreed to by the House so that an amount of notes could have been issued by national banks to the full face value of the bonds deposited, none of the contraction complained of would have occurred.

You sometimes blame the banks. You have driven the banks to this position. You require them to file bonds of the United States of the value of $130 in order to get $90 of circulation. They could not afford to do it. The bond at that rate yielded but 2½ per cent.

interest. Therefore bank after bank was compelled by the stress of circumstances to withdraw their circulation. You called in the bonds that were held by the banks, and compelled them to go into the market and buy new bonds at this high premium in order to maintain their circulation, or else go out of existence; and they did surrender their circulation, and what has been the extent of it? Since this Administration came into power the bank currency has thus been reduced $160,000,000. Here it is in the last official statement before me. Here is the statement of the Comptroller of the Currency. On page 74 of the report of the Comptroller it is stated that the amount of bank circulation in 1883–'84 was $316,020,326, and in 1887 it was $169,215,067, and since that time the reduction has been going on. On the 1st of November last this reduction had reached the figures I have stated—$147,000,000—and since then it has been going on more and more.

This was the policy of the Democratic party. It was a partisan movement, and they refused to consider a proposition in the House of Representatives which would have saved the reduction of bank circulation.

That is not all. When the banks did commence to reduce their circulation the only way they could do it was by depositing in the United States Treasury greenbacks—United States notes. They did that to the extent of $102,000,000, and those $102,000,000 are now tied up there by reason of this faulty action of the House of Representatives. The law expressly required that those greenbacks should be held to redeem the outstanding bank circulation when presented. The result of this policy on the part of the Democratic party is to make a double contraction; first, by tying up the greenbacks in the Treasury under the operations of law, and, second, by reducing the bank circulation.

Mr. President, whose fault is that? Could we in the Senate have prevented it? Did we not try to do so? If the measure that had been passed by the Senate, moved by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], had become a law by the concurrence of the House, there would have been no considerable contraction of bank circulation. The whole of this contraction has been brought about by the policy and by the movements of the Democratic party. If there is any distress in this country it is caused by this contraction of the currency. If we want to relieve the people of this country, Congress can do it very easily by continuing the present efficient banking system and giving the banks an opportunity to live. If we would now remove the restrictions imposed on the banks growing out of the advance of the bonds, they would maintain the circulation and increase it from time to time as the business of the country should demand; and yet, because they can not and will not make this onerous deposit, without any use to anybody, and will not buy bonds at 130 in order to obtain 90 per cent. of their face in circulating notes, you blame the national banks. The national banks are owned and governed by men of all parties. There are many Democrats in that system, and they have been compelled to do what all the others have done, to retire their circulation, not because they desired to do so, not because they wanted to contract the currency, but because you compelled them to do so.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] talks about the bondholders and the rich men of this country wishing to contract the currency. I say he is entirely mistaken about that. There is no such desire. There is no such interest in this country. There is nobody responsible for this condition of affairs except the Democratic party. I am almost tired of listening here to these tirades against bondholders, banks, etc., when, if there has been a contraction of the currency at all, it has been caused by the opposition of the Democratic party to all the great financial measures of the past.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now do not interrupt me.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. REAGAN. If the currency be contracted does not that necessarily increase the value of the bonds that are to be redeemed by increasing the difficulty of paying the money?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it does. On the contrary, the bonds are intrinsically valuable, because they are known to be perfectly good. They secure a prompt return of 4 per cent., and a 4 per cent. annuity issued by the Government is equivalent in market value to a premium of near 30 per cent. The banks are the purchasers of the bonds and not the sellers unless called in by the Government.

The Senator talks about contraction. The only contraction is caused by the refusal of proper legislation to meet the advancing value of the bonds. Other forms of currency are increasing. There is more currency now in circulation in the United States than there ever has been before, notwithstanding the contracting of bank currency. The importation of gold coin and bullion causes a vast accumulation of coin, which added to gold certificates, silver certificates, United States notes, and the diminished volume of bank circulation is now greater in the aggregate than ever before.

Here, again, I may refer to the Comptroller's report, in which the amount of the actual circulation is given, not, it is true, entirely in greenbacks, but in gold and silver coin. I have a table before me in the report of the Director of the Mint—and I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] referred to it—which shows that we have now in the United States in general circulation, in the Treasury, and in the national banks, first $346,681,016 of greenbacks; we have still notes of national banks amounting to $163,624,000; we have in gold coin $574,927,873, and in silver coin of various kinds, subsidiary and full legal-tender, $352,868,343; we have of gold and silver coin $927,796,000; of silver certificates $205,619,000, and gold certificates $123,660,000; and this, added to the paper money in circulation, shows an aggregate of money in the United States of more than $1,800,000,000, or more than the entire national debt. This table shows that we had of metallic money and bullion in the United States July 1, 1887, $1,007,513,901, and paper or representative money $909,612,285. I will insert this table in my remarks.

It has sometimes been said, and the question is asked by gentlemen around me, where did this gold come from? It is because the balance of trade has been in our favor for the last ten or twelve years. Ever since the resumption of specie payments gold has come into our country by the millions of dollars. It is easily shown by the official documents that this gold has come as the result of our sound industrial and financial system and having the balance of trade in our favor. Up to that time we had irredeemable paper money, such as the Senator from Texas would like to restore, and we had no such fountain of gold flowing upon us; but ever since that time gold has come here by the hundreds of millions, and now stays here, and adds to the volume of our currency. Most of the great transactions of this country are based on gold bullion and coin.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the better way would be to postpone all questions relating to our currency and all measures in regard to it for a little time, until we can have some opportunity for reflection and study. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] truly says no man can talk on these subjects or know about them without the most careful study. No wise man will pass his opinion on a proposition involving $100,000,000 upon a mere cursory examination, a hurried preparation made by a single Senator, without it being examined by experienced business men.

Let us look a little further into the pending proposition. The national-banking system unquestionably by this amendment, and by the hostile legislation of the Democratic party is destined to its overthrow. I do not deny that. Who has done it? The Democratic party. If that is a feather in their cap, let it be so. But the national-banking system has proved to be the best that ever was adopted in the history of mankind. It is copied by other nations, and the principles upon which it was founded, though it was established in the midst of civil war, have grown stronger and stronger, and its whole life has been a vast benefit to the people of this country. It has furnished a local circulation in almost every town in the United States, and this circulation has fed the fountains of business at home. It is the means by which money has been made active, by which crops have been moved, by which trade and industries have been carried on, and I stand here to defend that system, although it is now insidiously attempted to be overthrown by these various propositions. Its benefits have been untold to the people of the United States. It should have been treated fairly even by its opponents; yet the effort has been made to undermine it ever since the Democratic party came into power. I do not say this of the executive head of the Administration, but of the representatives who come mainly from the Southern States who seek to overthrow the system.

It is said that the national-banking system costs us something. Not one dollar. The national-banking system has cost the people of the United States not a single dollar. The banks buy the bonds of the United States and they give them increased value by making a large market for them. These bonds are deposited in the Treasury. They are paid for by the banks. The Government is at no expense whatever in the issuing of the bank-notes. Here a circulation has been furnished absolutely indisputable in credit, which travels all the world over, which is taken everywhere, and which is equal to gold or silver coin. It has been furnished free without a single shade of monopoly about it. Every man had the right to enter into the system, and the people did enter into it in every part of the country. It has furnished a circulation so absolutely safe that no living man has ever lost a dollar by it, and this has been without cost to the Government. Even the expense of redemption, the expense of printing, the expense of engraving, and every expense connected with the national-banking system has been paid by the banks themselves.

You propose to substitute a different policy, to buy silver bullion, not at its mint value, not at the old standard value, but at its market value, and under the operation of this system the price of silver has gone steadily down, notwithstanding the prophecies made in relation to it. You now propose to buy silver bullion and coin it, that is, to undergo an expense, in the first place, of 1½ per cent. to coin this extra silver to take the place of the national-bank notes. Then you issue the coined dollars, you transport them, you do everything to put them in circulation, all at the expense of the people of the United States, while the bank-notes cost you nothing, for the expenses were all paid by the banks themselves. Yet we are called on to substitute one for the other on this hurried movement. I say it is unwise, Senators. I can see that in the dim future, eight or ten or twelve or fifteen years hence, the national-banking system must disappear, because there is no security upon which national-bank notes can be based except the Government bonds, and Government bonds will disappear probably before fifteen years from this time.

They will disappear, and then these banks, from the necessity of the case, in due time will become mere banks of discount and deposit, and then the Government of the United States will be called on to provide some other form of paper money, whether in the shape of silver certificates, or coin certificates, or gold certificates, whether in the shape of gold, or silver coin, or greenbacks. The question would then properly come before us for decision, and so now we might make preparation for that event.

Sometimes it is said, and Senators near me seem to think, that I have been opposed to silver. I never have been. If the policy that I have always advocated had been adopted and acted upon silver never would have depreciated in market value as it has, so far as the Government of the United States, at least, was concerned; silver would have had an upward tendency. Its tendency by being demonetized in the great European states undoubtedly forced it downward; but the maintenance of silver as near as possible to the standard of gold on the present ratio is a wise effort of public policy. If we can not bring it up to that standard in market value we can approach it, and then by conventions with European nations we may probably establish a new ratio, and put gold and silver side by side as they have been in the past. But when in the markets they are rated at different values no power in the world, not even the United States, can bring them together. You may, by the line of policy you have been pursuing, reach finally the single silver basis, and place all your transactions on the same foundation as China and Japan and Mexico and South America, and thus detach yourselves from the great commercial nations of the world.

I desire to see these two metals put side by side with each other, of equal relative value upon a fixed ratio, but am opposed to this policy which has tended from the beginning to depreciate silver bullion.

What is the effect of this bill now? You increase the silver dollars in the Treasury and you issue your certificates upon them. You can not circulate those silver dollars, because two or three administrations have tried their utmost to get the dollars into full and active circulation, but the instincts and habits of our people are against either gold or silver coin in actual circulation. They should, however, be made the basis of circulation, and there can be no objection whatever to gold certificates issued upon gold bullion deposited in the Treasury at its market value. Its market value being fixed by the commercial nations is stable, 25.8 grains being the equivalent of the dollar according to our law, and similar amounts being equivalent to the standard of all European countries now.

What should we have done with silver? We should have done as France did, as France does, and as every Latin nation does. We should not have coined any more of it than was necessary for the ordinary transactions of business so that the people would absorb the coin, and on the balance of the silver bullion we should have issued silver certificates from the beginning, and we can do it now. There is no objection in the minds of the great body of financial men of this country to basing silver certificates upon silver bullion at its market value, and the certificates thus based, each representing its worth of silver, would be circulated freely without any change of the ratio, for I would not desire to see the ratio changed until it is changed by the consensus of the commercial nations of the world; and yet this proposition we are to act on without any examination! Let me go a little further.

We have seen a proposition here to issue more greenbacks, and it was adopted by the Senate, and the next morning the Senate evidently reconsidered that decision quietly and were disposed to recede. Who now would, in the light of the discussion we have had, open up again the question of the constitutional power of the United States to issue paper money except in time of war? Who would desire to have the question about the greenbacks opened, and to run the risk at certain times of excitement of a large issue of paper money which would fall below the standard of gold and silver coin? The good sense of the Senate sleeping over night induced the withdrawal of that proposition, and probably the good sense of the Senator from Kansas also induced him to withdraw it. It was done. One of the propositions disappeared.

Then another proposition was offered by my friend from Nevada, to buy substantially—because we were to purchase, though he said it was not a purchase—to buy substantially all the silver bullion that might be offered at a price that might be put up in fifteen days by half a dozen wealthy men, or put down. That was withdrawn, and what is left is the more simple and less harmless, but still dangerous, proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. But is it wise to consider any of these propositions until we consider them in their length and breadth?

I say that the United States notes can only be maintained at par in coin by the very reserve of money that the Senator from Texas would indiscriminately dissipate and expend. We had an irredeemable money and it continued irredeemable long after the war was over, long after the credit of the United States was restored, long after bonds had risen clear above par. In 1876 gold was quoted at a premium of about 15 per cent. Why did not our paper go up to par? Simply because there was no money behind it. The promise was outstanding, but there was no preparation to redeem it; but the very moment these preparations commenced the greenbacks went up steadily and steadily about 1 per cent. a month until they reached par in gold.

What did that? Was it done by the mere idle mandate of the resumption act? It was done by the accumulation of this very $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury. Just exactly as that gold accumulated in the Treasury so those notes approached to par, and when the time was reached so that even a doubting Thomas or any man, banker, broker, or what not, could see that the Government of the United States had made preparations to fulfill their promise, just that moment the gold was not demanded. Dissipate that gold, scatter it among the nations of the world, drive it from your shores, drive it to be hoarded in banks or in the strong boxes of the moneyed men, and leave this great amount of $346,000,000 of greenbacks unprotected by this large reserve, and what then would happen? A single Black Friday, a panic in stocks, some sudden event not now foreseen—because such events can not be foreseen—would make a gap between this paper promise and the gold or silver coin.

Why, Mr. President, it seems to me idle to debate this question; it has been debated so long and so often. We have gone through one period of depression, the panic of 1873. We have gone through one time of stringency to bring our notes up to the standard of coin. Why disturb that? I do not see why. Therefore these various propositions made from time to time by gentlemen upon these most difficult and intricate questions of finance grate harshly upon me, I confess. As a conservative man I desire to see just as much money in circulation in this country as can be used by the people of the country, and I would rather have it too much than too little; but what I want is that it shall be good money, good in every market of the world, whether it may be the paper promises or gold or silver coin; that they shall be only so issued as to be maintained at par with each other in every market.

The silver dollar that has been coined, intrinsically now worth only 72 cents, cost the Government on an average about 86 cents on the dollar. I do not care anything about the loss, because that is small, comparatively. We can base our currency on these silver dollars, but the silver dollars can not be forced into circulation side by side with gold without making a gap between the two.

Mr. STEWART. Does the Senator say our silver dollar is only worth 72 cents?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bullion in it is only worth that.

Mr. TELLER. The Government pays them out at par.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Government pays them out at par and we receive them at par, and it is that fact which maintains them. It is because the fiat of the Government is behind them, but if that fiat was withdrawn and we satisfy the business men of this country that they must come down to the silver standard they will readily adapt themselves to that basis easily and without loss, but the people of the country generally will not and can not. They will not foresee it, and I trust the time will never come—and I believe in that the Senator from Colorado will agree with me—when the Government of the United States will not maintain all these silver dollars and the silver certificates based upon them up to the standard of gold.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I desire.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator desires it. I am glad to hear him say so, and I am glad to co-operate with him; and to the extent that silver bullion or silver money can be used, I do not care whether a hundred millions or a thousand millions are issued. So long as it can be maintained by the power of the Government at par with gold coin I do not care how much is issued; but I fear that in some idle moment some hap-hazard movement may even without their aid and against their consent, probably, derange the relative value of the two metals, and make a gap between silver and gold, and then we shall see the result?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Suppose gold should continue to go up in purchasing power as it has for the last sixteen years, and become 20 per cent. more valuable than it is now, does the Senator want to make property correspondingly less valuable?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think that is a question that is at all involved in this matter. Is the Senator, on the other hand, willing to have silver alone as the standard of value in this country?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I should want some adequate amount of silver. I do not think there is near enough of it yet. We want more silver.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Nevada, who is a good business man, shrinks from the possibility of a gap between these two metals, and so do I.

Mr. TELLER. Nobody proposes a gap. Have we proposed it? Have we suggested it?

Mr. SHERMAN. You do not propose a gap, but it may come.

Mr. President, I have said enough on this subject. I am willing to do all that can be done to maintain silver, provided the Senators will stand by me in maintaining these two metals at par with each other until by the common consent of the nations of the world who control the money markets there may be a ratio more nearly approaching stability than the present one, for I shall be glad indeed to see silver advance above our ratio and reach the French standard, if it can be brought about. If any line of public policy can be devised that tends to advance our silver to the French standard of 15½ to 1 and make it conform to the standard of the Latin nations, that policy I will as cheerfully embrace and as cheerfully adopt as any other. Until then I prefer to go along meeting such difficulties as arise and postponing those that we can not solve until a more happy period.

These remarks have been drawn out by the remarks made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and by the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]. The Senator from Kansas held up as a bill of fearful proportions, of dangerous tendencies, one called the Aldrich bill. Every member of the Committee on Finance knows very well that I did not take any particular interest in that bill, although I was willing to have it reported. He quoted that as a bill which I was advocating, and the principle of the bill I do advocate. It contains two provisions only. One is that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized—not directed—to so compound with the holders of the bonds as to reduce the rate of interest to 2½ per cent. and to pay the difference in money, based on the idea of saving to the United States interest at 3 per cent. compounded.

Everybody can see that such a transaction would be beneficial to the Government. Every one can see that at times when the demand for money is great and the bond market somewhat weak, the bondholders might be willing to exchange for the difference in ready money a bond bearing 4 per cent. interest for a bond bearing 2½ per cent. By the payment of a reasonable sum of money the Government would save more than one-half of the interest accruing before the bond becomes due. That transaction every business man can see would be a profitable one.

Then it provides further that the reduced bond at 2½ per cent. interest may be deposited with the Treasury, and upon that basis banking circulation may issue. There can be no doubt about the wisdom of that if the banking system is to endure until the debt is paid, but to issue notes to the face value of this bond would not be a wise provision. I intended when the bill came up to reduce the issue of notes, as it is now, to 90 per cent., and then it would be perfectly safe, because all the present bonds will mature in a few years and will be paid off. I can not now tell whether any provision can be then made whereby to continue in existence the national banks; but until then they are the safest depositories of the power of issuing paper money that I know of, unless the Government chooses to embark again in the policy of issuing greenbacks.

Take these bank-notes and the United States notes as now limited by law together with certificates based on the market value of gold and silver bullion, and you have a currency which you may compare with that of any nation of the world. It can not be taken away from you. It will not be exported, and it may even endure the current of a balance of trade against you. We must not forget that our exceptional prosperity and our exceptional condition now grow out of the prosperity of our people in all branches of industry. Although there may be and doubtless are low prices, and here and there distress, yet as a country compared with other countries ours is altogether the most prosperous of any in the world. It can compare with any other in public credit, in public faith, in public honor, in our currency, in our finances, in our large accruing revenue, and especially in the protective system which lies at the bottom of the great prosperity our people have enjoyed for the last twenty years.

With these remarks I am willing to take the vote on this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I had hoped that we should get through with this bill without any lengthy debate upon questions relating to the currency, and I have declined thus far to express any views on that subject. I agree in the view of the Senator from Ohio that it would have been better to have passed this bill without amendment, and I desired that that should be done. Indeed, I would have preferred not to pass the bill, but it seemed to be necessary because the President of the United States had expressed some doubts of his power to buy bonds under the existing law. I know of nobody else who doubts that power.

After the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin in the nature of a substitute, which I think is an improvement upon the bill as proposed by the Finance Committee or as it came to us from the House of Representatives, the Senator from Kentucky saw proper to add to it his provision respecting silver. I voted for that proposition. I voted for it, having made such careful examination as I could during the intervening period between the time it was offered and the time the vote was taken, and I would not rise now to speak upon that amendment or to say one word respecting it except for a remark which I think inadvertently dropped from the Senator from Ohio, that the amendment in its effect and purpose will alarm the business interests of the country.

If I believed that there was any just cause of alarm in this amendment I would stand as firmly as the Senator from Ohio against it. But although this amendment looks to an additional coinage of silver as provided under the act of 1878, there is nothing in it that has a tendency which should in the slightest degree alarm the people of this country as respects silver coinage.

Why, Mr. President, this Administration, hostile as I believe it to be to silver, hostile as it has shown itself to be in its public utterances, whether in letters or in Presidential messages, during the past fiscal year, as shown by its own reports, has bought more than $2,000,000 worth of silver beyond what the law required it to buy. This administration of the Treasury Department coined during the last year $34,000,000 of silver dollars when it was not necessary for it to have coined more than about $30,000,000.

Now, it is necessary for us to see the result and effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. That amendment when first shown me looked somewhat alarming, because I had some fear that under it there would be perhaps an excessive coinage of silver; but I hold in my hand a statement sent to me this afternoon, since this debate commenced, in response to a telegram from me, respecting the diminution of national-bank currency for the last eight months. I did not ask for the state of the national-bank currency during the period prior to the 1st of July, 1887, because during that period the banks were generally surrendering the 3 per cent. bonds and there was an abnormal condition of surrender.

I have this statement in my hand, which discloses that the net reduction of the national-bank notes during the last eight months has only been $6,560,000, in round numbers; to be exactly accurate, $6,560,295. That refers to notes of national banks having outstanding bonds against them. Of course I am not now speaking of national-bank notes that were surrendered against the greenbacks of which the Senator from Ohio spoke, about $102,000,000, as he said, although there should properly be made a great reduction from that amount.

It so happens that by the sixth section of the act of 1882, which I have before me, the banks may reorganize, and three years after that reorganization they are bound either to take up their old circulation or deposit in the Treasury of the United States greenback notes in order to take the place of that circulation; and when they take up their old circulation or deposit greenbacks they are entitled at once to take new circulation. So of the $103,000,000, which is in the Treasury as charged against national-bank circulation, $47,565,606 is bank circulation surrendered by means of lawful money under the sixth section of the act of 1882; and under that act national banks have taken actual circulation in place of it.

So then of this large amount which appears in the debt statement of the Treasury as respects national-bank circulation there is an apparent statement which is, in effect, false; and I hope the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL], who made such a clear and admirable exhibit, as reported in the RECORD the other day, of the existing condition of the Treasury, will take note of that situation of the national-bank notes in the next statement which he makes.

For the past eight months there has only been a reduction of $6,560,000 of national-bank notes. I venture the prediction, without of course having any accurate data, that during the next eight months there will not be as great an amount of national-bank notes surrendered as was surrendered during the last eight months, so that the ultimate effect——

Mr. PLATT. Then, if I understand the Senator, there has been no absolute contraction of the currency during the last eight months, but an increase of the currency by reason of the silver coinage, and he thinks that during the next eight months there will also be an increase of the currency without any action here.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no doubt of that, and I can state further that during the very last month there was an increase of circulation by reason of the issue of silver certificates of more than $7,000,000; and it may as well be stated here and now whilst we are talking of expansion and contraction of the currency, that by the ordinary Treasury operations of our Government these expansions and contractions go on at the rate of from ten to twenty million dollars a month without exciting the slightest perturbation in business circles, and therefore it is that this is the mildest and gentlest and most harmless amendment as respects the expansion of circulation that could possibly be devised.

Now, I want to say another word in connection with this reduction of circulation. This reduction of bank circulation in the last six or eight months would scarcely have amounted to anything but for the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury in September last commenced depositing surplus money with national banks. He allowed national banks to receive deposits upon 4 per cent. bonds, which were worth in the market 125, at the rate of $1.10 for each dollar of the face of the bonds; and more than $5,000,000 of this surrender of national-bank circulation was surrendered by national banks in order that they might turn their bonds right over under this order of the Secretary of the Treasury, and instead of receiving 90 per cent. circulation receive 110 per cent. So the operation of the financial minister of this Government during the last four or five months was to make national banks surrender their circulation and put the very bonds that were held as security for that circulation up as security for the deposit of public money, whereby they received 110 instead of 90 per cent.

If that process had not gone on for the last six or eight months, the situation of the Treasury would be that there would have been practically no surrender and no decrease of national-bank circulation during that time. All this money was deposited without interest, but, of course, a national bank that had 4 per cent. bonds worth 125 in the market, receiving only 90 per cent. circulation for the face value, could surrender those bonds to the Secretary of the Treasury and turn them over at once to its deposit account and receive $1.10 in currency, thus making 20 per cent. by the operation.

I am glad to say that that process has been discontinued, as I understand, so that it goes on no longer. That being so, and the banks now being held down to their 90 per cent., will undoubtedly not continue to make these exchanges for their own advantage.

Mr. McPHERSON. Yet the Senator says that in eight long months only about $6,000,000 have been surrendered. Therefore, of what does he complain?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I am merely stating facts. I will leave the Senators on the other side of the Chamber to complain if they dislike that method of financiering as respects the national banks. It is not for me to complain or to sustain at this moment. I am merely stating the facts that but for this Treasury process there would have been no diminution practically of national-bank circulation during the last six months.

There is another provision, which is a limitation clearly upon this amendment of the Senator from Kentucky. By the law of 1882 it is not possible to surrender more than $3,000,000 per month for all purposes of national-bank circulation, unless the banks are forced into liquidation by the appointment of a receiver, and it is not probable that more than one-third of that amount will be from national banks that are surrendering a part of their circulation.

Mr. STEWART. Let me ask the Senator if they have bought any bonds during the past six months? Would it not have changed the condition if $100,000,000 had been used to buy bonds?

Mr. ALLISON. The Secretary of the Treasury in less than two months, during the quarter composed of September, October, and November, not only filled the sinking fund of last year, but bought a sufficient amount of bonds to cover the entire sinking fund of the year 1888.

Mr. STEWART. That was five months ago.

Mr. ALLISON. It was within the period of time referred to. I am showing that with all these extraordinary circumstances of the situation with respect to the bonds, without regard to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury held out to the banks an inducement——

Mr. STEWART. How was it in the preceding eight months when he was buying bonds?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not speaking of that. Of course, during the preceding fiscal year there was a surrender of national-bank circulation to the extent of $75,000,000.

Mr. STEWART. Would not the purchase of bonds have a similar effect?

Mr. ALLISON. I think not, for the reason that no matter what the purchase of the bonds may be, the banks can only surrender $3,000,000 a month, so that the maximum under this bill that they can not possibly exceed is $36,000,000 of national-bank circulation in a year for all purposes, and it is not possible that more than one-half of that sum will be for the surrender of circulation which is contemplated in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky. Now, therefore, I want to say that there is no just or proper reason why anybody should be alarmed at the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky as I view it and as I understand it; and on that account mainly I desired to make this explanation in regard to it.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to ask the Senator a question. He spoke about the Treasury having coined $34,000,000 of silver last year, as he says about $4,000,000 in excess of the amount required by law.

Mr. ALLISON. Two million dollars' worth in excess.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask him if he does not overlook the law providing for the redemption and recoinage of the trade-dollar?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I am not only not overlooking it, but I have examined it with care. The trade-dollars, $6,690,000 of them, are stowed away in the vaults of the Treasury now, and they are not involved or included at all in the calculation which I have made.

Mr. PLUMB. Then, as I understand it, the Treasury Department have not recoined the trade-dollar, as required by law. Then, instead of there having been more coinage than the minimum required by law, there has been less, taking the two classes of coins together. I ask if that is not true?

Mr. ALLISON. I am not defending the Administration.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to ascertain what the fact is.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that I have before me the report of the Director of the Mint, which shows the amount of bullion purchased. Of course that could not include trade-dollars.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know whether it could or not.

Mr. ALLISON. They were put in without purchase.

Mr. PLUMB. No; the trade-dollars were purchased by the exchange of ordinary silver dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. They were redeemed at par. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that the report of the Director of the Mint shows the purchase of $26,000,000 worth of bullion.

Mr. PLUMB. Is there a separate report showing the operations of the law of February 19, 1887, providing for the redemption of the trade-dollar so as to make it certain that there has been no mixing of the two accounts in the Treasury Department?

Mr. ALLISON. There has been no mixing, because the trade-dollars have not been coined, with the exception of about a million and a half.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Iowa please answer the question whether the recoinage of the trade-dollar was left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury under the law or whether it was an absolute requirement?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not the law before me. I will refer Senators to the statutes, because I do not propose to discuss the question of the trade-dollar.

Mr. McPHERSON. It was left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; it was left to the discretion of the Secretary. I have not the statute before me.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Iowa answer me a question, and that question is, Will he yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. ALLISON. I will only take a moment more.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa one further question. He speaks about the retirement of national-bank circulation during the past eight months. I ask him if he does not think a much larger retirement will be made, and if the Treasury will not be needing, for some time to come, national-bank notes to come in and thereby contract the currency still further?

Mr. ALLISON. I stated distinctly that this did not include the national-bank notes now offered to banks, to greenbacks, or money in the Treasury.

Mr. PLUMB. Can the Senator state the amount of contraction which is liable to occur during a short period of time by reason of the presentation of these bank-notes for redemption?

Mr. ALLISON. I can not, but I think it can not exceed $18,000,000. I did not rise to discuss that question. I only wanted to say that there was no justifiable ground for any business man to be alarmed at the vote of the Senate to-day. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] shows me that the trade-dollars have been melted and they are ready for coinage, but not yet coined.

Mr. President, I wish to say one word more in reply to the suggestions which were made by the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Ohio stated that the silver act was a mistake from the beginning; that we have failed in the proper treatment of that question; and that we should have followed the example of France and other Latin nations as respects silver. I do not, at this moment, intend to enter upon an argument of that question. It is a sufficient answer for the present to say that in 1878 we had no silver and France had certainly $800,000,000 of it, two and a half times as much silver coin of five-franc pieces, having 3 per cent. less of bullion in them than our silver dollars of to-day. It may have been an unwise thing for us to coin silver, but I think, under the circumstances and situation that surrounded us, the legislation of 1878 has been fully and thoroughly justified.

Mr. PLUMB. We could not have resumed without it.

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for saying that, because I believe it would not have been possible to have maintained resumption without it. Therefore, whatever the defects in that legislation, I am here ready to defend it on all occasions as necessary and proper legislation under our then circumstances and conditions.

I do not pretend, nor does anybody pretend, that the bullion value of silver to-day in our silver dollar, measured in gold, is equal to 25.8 grains of gold. Every man who has a grain of information upon this subject knows that when we coined silver by limitation of statute and by the purchase of bullion on account of the Government, that moment we made silver and gold part company, if they had not parted before, because we left our mints still open to the free and unlimited coinage of gold.

What is our silver coin to-day? It is nothing more nor less than a paper money having a local circulation in our country based upon silver coin. That is what it is, and that is what our gold coin is to a certain extent. It is a paper money having an absolute metal flavor certainly equal to 75 or 73 per cent. of its value in gold. Just how long that will continue without detriment to what is called the gold standard I am not here now to argue, although I have a belief respecting it.

But I wish to say to all the business men who may be alarmed lest we shall coin a million or two million more of silver this year than we ought, that it will be many years under the operation of existing laws as respects coinage before there will be any danger of an outflow of gold. I do not say what will happen if we shall so adjust our internal affairs by a change as respects our revenue laws as will affect the balance of trade and make it against us, because when that time comes, when we become a debtor nation instead of a creditor nation, as we are to-day, and when we are not able to settle those balances with bonds and securities or other arrangements, but are compelled to send metallic money to other countries, whether it be gold or silver, it will go there as bullion and be credited to us as bullion.

Whether our gold will not then go I am not prepared to say, but it is true that every single year from the passage of the act of 1878 to this moment we have imported more gold than we have exported, and in addition to that we have added the entire products of our mines, amounting on the average to $30,000,000 per annum.

So, whilst I would be as ready as any Senator to find just cause of alarm as respects the situation of our currency, I do not believe even with the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky that there is any reasonable danger that the additional coinage of silver which will result therefrom will amount to a single one-thousandth part of a cent per annum as respects the great measures of values which now adjust all our affairs, whether it be our cash transactions or our credit affairs.

I would not have said this much upon these questions but for the fact that I feared from a remark which inadvertently fell from the lips of the Senator from Ohio, that I might be called to account for the vote I have given, as a vote tending to disturb the business interests of the country.

Mr. PLUMB. I think we can now have a vote on the bill without any further delay, and have the matter finally disposed of. I hope the Senate will be so minded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment made to the bill as in Committee of the Whole as amended on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Is the bill open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order to move to amend it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. At the end of the first section I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to coin more than $4,000,000 worth per month, as fixed as the limit in the act of February 28, 1878.

Mr. STEWART. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves to lay the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SAWYER. I wish to submit the report of a committee of conference.

Mr. VOORHEES. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MEMPHIS.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2927) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn., having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 1, line 11, after the word "and," and before the word "for," insert the words "at the option of the corporation by which it may be built;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14, and agree to the same.

PHILETUS SAWYER,
G. G. VEST,
ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
CHARLES F. CRISP,
JAMES PHELAN,
M. D. LAGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BERRY. There is some misunderstanding as to the effect of the agreement on the first amendment in regard to compelling the company to provide a passage for wagons, vehicles of all kinds, and foot passengers. I wish to be informed as to the effect of the agreement of the conferees.

Mr. HARRIS. I will answer the inquiry of the Senator from Arkansas. The bill as reported from the Committee on Commerce to the Senate left it optional with the bridge-builders to provide for a wagon and foot-passenger way upon the bridge. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] made it imperative upon the bridge-builders to construct a wagon and foot way. The House conferees receded from their disagreement to the Senate amendment and agreed to the same with an amendment which amounts to exactly this: The bill as agreed upon by the conferees makes it the duty of the bridge-builders to construct a wagon way, and leaves it to the option of the builders to construct a foot-passenger way in addition thereto or not as they may choose; but the wagon-way they are compelled to construct.

Mr. BERRY. I will state that that explanation is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. VOORHEES. I renew my motion that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 5, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 4, 1888.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PRINTING AND BINDING, POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Postmaster-General submitting certain revised estimates for the postal service for printing and binding for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL-ROUTE LETTINGS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting supplemental report of offers received under miscellaneous advertisements for mail-routes issued January 24, 1887; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

AGREEMENT WITH CERTAIN INDIAN TRIBES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1956) to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Gros Ventre, Piegan, Blood, Blackfeet, and River Crow Indians, in Montana.

Mr. PEEL. Inasmuch as the Senate asks a conference with the House on this bill, I ask unanimous consent that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked for.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SURVIVORS OF UNITED STATES STEAMER TALLAPOOSA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 869) for the relief of the sufferers from the wreck of the United States steamer Tallapoosa; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GALLINGER. At the close of the last session of Congress a bill had passed the Senate, and was then at the head of the Calendar of the House, identical in substance with this. This bill has now passed the Senate, and has been likewise unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims of the House, and is on the Calendar. I therefore ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the Senate bill.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I must object, with a view to reaching the direct-tax bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPRINT OF TARIFF BILL AND REPORT.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday morning I asked unanimous consent to have printed additional copies of the tariff bill, embracing also the report of the committee.

Mr. REED. Let that also include the views of the minority.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Also the views of the minority. The RECORD fails to show the request for printing the report.

The SPEAKER. That was the order directed to be made at the time, and the Journal shows that the report was ordered to be printed as well as the bill. This order will also include the views of the minority of the committee.

REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE ON FORESTRY.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, a resolution was reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands some time ago, asking the Commissioner of Agriculture for certain information, which was prepared and addressed to the Speaker of the House in response to that resolution and submitted to the House, but by mistake was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. It should either be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands or to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McRAE. I suggest that it had better be ordered to be printed for the use of the Committee on the Public Lands, or else that it should go direct to the Committee on Printing, as we have no use for it in that shape.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. To what does the report relate?

Mr. HATCH. To the subject of forestry.

LOCKS AND DAMS ON THE CUMBERLAND RIVER.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to report back the joint resolution (H. Res. 81) to authorize the purchase of lands necessary for the construction of locks and dams on the Cumberland River, with the recommendation that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked by the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference. Without objection, this order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. OUTHWAITE, for three days, on account of important business.

DISALLOWED POSTMASTERS' CLAIMS, KENTUCKY.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I send to the Clerk's desk the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing a resolution of inquiry which I introduced on the 19th of March, and which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, in regard to the disallowance of pending claims of postmasters in Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TAULBEE submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a tabulated statement of the disallowed postmasters' claims presented from the State of Kentucky under the act of March 3, 1883, exhibiting all such claims as by an actual computation of commissions prescribed by the act of 1854, and entered upon claim jackets, show that the paid salaries are 10 per cent. or more less than such commissions. Such tabulated statement to show in each case: First, the name of the post-office; second, the name of the applicant; third, the period of service covered by the computation of commissions; fourth, the amount of the computed commissions; fifth, the amount of paid salary for the same term of service; sixth, the actual amount of commissions in excess of the paid salary.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads could indicate any time within a reasonable period in the future that we could have assurance there would be a report on this resolution I have no desire to press the matter now or to occupy the time of the House in discussion.

Mr. DOCKERY. The chairman of the committee is now absent in the committee-room, that committee being engaged in the preparation of the Post-Office appropriation bill. Personally I do not know anything about the matter which the gentleman from Kentucky has called to the attention of the House, but I know that neither the Post-Office Committee nor any member of it has any desire to suppress any request for information.

Mr. BLOUNT (having just entered the Hall). I desire to say that the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky has been referred to a subcommittee and will be acted on soon. There is no disposition to withhold the information. There are a number of matters before the committee, and this, like others, will be taken up and disposed of when it can be reached. The rules require that the appropriation bill shall be reported within thirty days of the commencement of a session; but the committees never report the bills within that time. We intend as soon as possible to make a report on the resolution to which the gentleman from Kentucky has called attention.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask the gentleman from Georgia what rule do we now have which requires an appropriation bill to be reported within the first thirty days of the session. I have been seeking to have a rule of that kind reported from the Committee on Rules, and I am not aware that there is any such rule now in existence.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman from Kentucky submit?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Is this a privileged matter?

The SPEAKER. It is privileged if the gentleman from Kentucky submits a motion.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would not be understood as reflecting on the purposes of the committee in regard to reporting back this resolution; and as the gentleman from Missouri and the chairman of the committee have intimated that it will be reported within a reasonable time, I will not offer any motion.

REFUND OF DIRECT TAX OF 1861.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 139) to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of that bill; and pending that motion I move that general debate be limited to one hour, and upon the latter motion I demand the previous question. But by the leave of the House I will state to the gentlemen who are opposing this bill that if they will fix any hour when, by unanimous consent, it can be considered that the previous question is ordered, I can probably agree with what they may suggest.

Mr. OATES. What is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I have moved to limit general debate to one hour, and I now suggest that if the opponents of the bill will fix any hour as satisfactory to them I may probably agree to it.

Mr. OATES. I have been endeavoring to ascertain the number of gentlemen who want to speak on this side and the length of time they would probably consume. They are gentlemen who have not yet spoken; and I think, from the inquiry I have made, it would take about three hours for all who want to speak to have an opportunity to do so. I think we can get through in three hours.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Will it be understood that at the end of three hours we will take a vote?

Mr. OATES. I can only speak for myself as to that. I am not authorized to speak for other gentlemen.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I am willing to agree to almost any time if it is understood that that will end the discussion. Otherwise I must insist on my motion.

Mr. OATES. I am satisfied that three hours is as much as all the gentlemen who want to speak on this side will seek to consume. If that time is allowed I think that will be the end of general debate.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Then may I ask unanimous consent that at the end of three hours the previous question shall be ordered on the bill?

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chair understands the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to say that three hours will be satisfactory to the gentlemen who desire to speak in opposition, and that general debate may then be closed. But the gentleman from Ohio will understand that unless there be an agreement to the contrary the bill will then be open to debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. REED. It would be competent to agree that a vote shall be taken at 4 o'clock in the House. It is the desire on this side to allow ample opportunity for discussion, if after that we can have a vote upon the bill.

Mr. OATES. I feel authorized to say that the length of time indicated will be fully satisfactory as regards the general debate, but I am not authorized to go further than that.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered at 4 o'clock, and that the vote be then taken upon the bill.

Mr. OATES. I could not consent to that, because that would cut off amendments.

Mr. REED. Will 5 o'clock suit the gentleman? That will give an hour and a half for amendments.

Mr. OATES. That may be sufficient, but I do not know what amendments may be offered.

Mr. REED. It is well to be perfectly frank, and we all know what we desire to do. There is no objection on the part of the friends of this bill to any discussion which can be deemed reasonable on the part of those who are opposed to it, if at the end of that time we can come to a vote. Of course we are limited to to-day so far as the present assignment is concerned, and if after that time there is no intention of using any obstructive measures, then we can come to an agreement; but if there is an intention to use obstructive measures, those who are in favor of the bill will be quite likely to consider the debate which is asked for as in the nature of occupying just so much time. That being understood—of course we all understand it—what we desire is to have an agreement which will cover the point wherein we are opposed. We on our part desire to give an opportunity for discussion to any extent which gentlemen may deem satisfactory within reasonable limits, but we desire also the passage of the bill, and we do not wish to have it obstructed by dilatory motions or maneuvers. Now, the gentlemen on the other side say that they are satisfied with three hours, and as I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] he is entirely willing that they shall have all the time to themselves except a few moments. That being the case, will the other side now agree that the vote shall be taken at, say, 5 o'clock upon the bill and amendments?

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I have been diligent to ascertain the wishes of the gentlemen who agree with me in opposition to this bill, and I can state that if three hours are allowed to this side for general debate nothing more will be asked as to general debate; but further than that I am unable to state. All that I ask for is that the bill may take the usual course. It may be understood now that general debate shall cease at the time indicated and that then there will be an opportunity to offer amendments, but I can not undertake to say when a vote shall be had.

Mr. REED. I think we understand each other, and we can very easily test the question. I ask the Speaker to put my request for unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of this bill and that the previous question be considered as ordered, and the vote taken on the passage of the bill at 5 o'clock.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that the previous question should be ordered on the bill and amendments.

Mr. REED. On the bill and amendments, of course.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, that includes, of course, all amendments that may be offered when we come to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that it would include all amendments pending at the time the Committee of the Whole is discharged.

Mr. REED. Yes. The proposition allows three hours for debate on the part of the opponents of the bill, it allows an hour for amendment, and it takes the vote on whatever is pending at the expiration of the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed at the expiration of three hours after the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; that at 5 o'clock the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and report the same back to the House with all pending amendments, including amendments which may be offered; and that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the adoption of the amendments and the passage of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. OATES. The first part of the proposition, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to agree to, but——

Mr. REED. That is, the part you are in favor of you are willing to agree to, but the other part you are not. That is not business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] moves that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the special order, and pending that he moves that general debate be closed in one hour, and upon that motion he demands the previous question. The question is first on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 28.

Mr. OATES. No quorum.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 28, not voting 127; as follows:

VETO MESSAGE—N. M'KAY AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without approval, House bill 2477, entitled "An act for the relief of Nathaniel McKay and the executors of Donald McKay."

It is proposed by this bill to allow the beneficiaries named therein to present to the Court of Claims for determination certain demands made by them against the Government on account of the construction of two iron-clad monitors called the Squando and the Nauset, and a side-wheel steamer called the Ashuelot.

The contracts for building these vessels were made early in 1863. It was agreed that they should be completed within six or eight months. It was also provided in these contracts that the Government "should have the privilege of making alterations and additions to the plans and specifications at any time during the progress of the work as it may deem necessary and proper," and that if said alterations and additions should cause extra expense to the contractors, the Government would "pay for the same at fair and reasonable rates."

It thus appears that the time allowed for the completion of these vessels was with the assent of the contractors made exceedingly short; that notwithstanding this fact they consented to permit such alterations of plans as must almost necessarily prolong the time, fixing no limit to such extension, and that in the same breath they fix their measure of compensation for such alterations and any extended time consequent thereon, at "a fair and reasonable rate" for the extra expense caused thereby.

Almost immediately upon the beginning of their work alterations and changes were made in the original plans for these vessels, and they were repeated and continued to such a degree that the completion of the vessels was delayed many months.

In the latter part of the year 1864 and early in the year 1865 payments in excess of the contract price were made by the Navy Department to the contractors, under the provisions of the contract above recited. The contract price for the Squando was $395,000. The contractors claimed extra compensation amounting to $337,329.46, and there was allowed $194,525.70. The contract price of the Nauset was $386,000, the extra compensation claimed was $314,768.93, and the amount allowed $192,110.98. The contract price of the side-wheel steamer Ashuelot was $275,000, the extra compensation claimed was $81,447.50, and the amount allowed was $22,415.92. The different sums as thus adjusted were received by the contractors in settlement of their claims for extra expense, and receipts in full were given by them to the Government.

A number of other contractors had done like work for the Government and claimed to have demands growing out of the same for extra compensation.

Evidently, with the view of investigating and settling these claims, on the 9th day of March, 1865, the Senate passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to organize a board of not less than three persons, whose duty it shall be to inquire into and determine how much the vessels of war and steam machinery contracted for by the Department in the years 1862 and 1863 cost the contractors over and above the contract price and allowance for extra work, and report the same to the Senate at its next session; none but those that have given satisfaction to the Department to be considered."

This board was appointed by the Secretary of the Navy on the 25th day of May, 1865, and consisted of a commodore, a chief engineer, and a paymaster in the Navy. Its powers were broad and liberal, and comprehended an inquiry touching all things that made up "the cost to the contractors" of their work in excess of the contract price and allowances for extra work.

The board convened on the 6th day of June, 1865, and sat continuously until the 23d day of December following and made numerous awards to contractors. The parties mentioned in the bill now under consideration were notified on the 9th and 15th days of June, 1865, to prepare and submit testimony to the board in support of their claims, and they repeatedly signified their intention to do so.

Donald McKay was the contractor for the construction of the monitor Nauset and the steamer Ashuelot. The proceedings of the board show that on the 11th day of August, 1865, he notified the board that the only claim he made for loss was on the hull, boiler, and machinery, of the Ashuelot, which he would be prepared to present in about six weeks.

Neither of these parties presented any statement to the board, and no claim of theirs was passed upon.

On the 2d day of March, 1867, an act was passed directing the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the claims of all contractors for building vessels of war and steam machinery for the same, under contracts made after May 1, 1861, and before January 1, 1864. He was by said act required "to ascertain the additional cost which was necessarily incurred by each contractor in the completion of his work by reason of any changes or alterations in the plans and specifications required and delays in the prosecution of the work occasioned by the Government which were not provided for in the original contract." It was further provided that there should be reported to Congress a tabular statement of each case, which should contain "the name of the contractor, a description of the work, the contract price, the whole increased cost of the work over the contract price, and the amount of such increased cost caused by the delay and action of the Government as aforesaid, and the amount already paid the contractor over and above the contract price."

Under this act Commodore J. B. Marchand, Chief Engineer J. W. King, and Paymaster Edward Foster, of the Navy, were designated by the Secretary of the Navy to make the investigation required. These officers, on the 26th day of November, 1867, made a report of their proceedings, which was submitted to the Senate with a tabulated statement of all the claims examined by them and their findings thereon.

It appears by this report that the claims of the beneficiaries mentioned in the bill herewith returned were examined by the board, and that nothing was found due thereon under the terms of the law directing their examination.

These claims have frequently been before Congress since that time. They have been favorably reported and acted upon a number of times, and have also been more than once strongly condemned by committees to whom they were referred.

A resolution was passed in 1871 by the Congress referring these and other claims of a like character to the Court of Claims for adjudication, but it was vetoed by the President for reasons not necessarily affecting the merits of the claims.

The case of Chouteau vs. The United States, reported in 5th Otto, page 61, which arose out of the contract to build a vessel called the Etlah, appears to present the same features that belong to the claims here considered. It is stated in the report of the House committee on this bill that "the Squando and Nauset were identical in the original plans and the changes and alterations thereon with the Etlah and Shiloh, built in St. Louis;" and yet the Supreme Court of the United States distinctly decided in the Etlah case that the only pretext for further compensation should be sought for in the contract where the contractor had evidently been content to provide for all the remedy he desired.

It seems, then, that the contractors mentioned in this bill, after entering into contracts plainly indicating that changes of plans and consequent delay in their work were in their contemplation, availed themselves of the remedy which they themselves had provided, and thereupon received about 50 per cent. in the case of two of these vessels of the contract price for extra work, giving the Government a receipt in full. When soon thereafter opportunity was offered them to make further claim of as broad a nature as they could desire they failed to do so, and one of them disclaimed any right to recover on account of one of the vessels, though all are now included in the present bill. In 1867 the claims were fully examined under a law of Congress and rejected, and the Supreme Court in an exactly similar case finds neither law nor equity supporting them.

If it be claimed that no compensation has been yet allowed solely for the increase in the price of labor and material caused by delay in construction, it is no hardship to say that as the contractors made provision for change of plans and delay, they must be held to have taken the risk of such rise in price and be satisfied with the provision they have made against it. Besides, much of the increase in the price of labor and material is included in the extra cost which has already been reimbursed to them.

But the bill does not provide that these contractors shall be limited in the Court of Claims to a recovery solely for loss occasioned by increase of the cost of labor and material during the delay caused by the Government. By the terms of the proposed act the court is directed to ascertain the additional cost necessarily incurred in building the vessels by reason of any changes or alterations in the plans and specifications, and delays in the prosecution of the work. This, it seems to me, would enable these contractors to open the whole question of compensation for extra work.

It hardly seems fair to the Government to permit these claims to be presented after a lapse of twenty-three years since a settlement in full was made and receipts given after the opportunity which has been offered for establishing further claims if they existed, and when, as a consequence of the contractor's neglect, the Government would labor under great disadvantages in its defense.

I am of the opinion, in view of the history of these claims and the suspicion naturally excited as to their merit, that no injustice will be done if they are laid at rest instead of being given new life and vigor in the Court of Claims.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, April 4, 1888.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on War Claims, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEES APPOINTED.

The Speaker announced as the managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 1956 Mr. PEEL, Mr. HARE, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE; and on the joint resolution H. Res. 81 Mr. BLANCHARD, Mr. STEWART of Texas, and Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. HUDD, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Patents was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9085) to amend sections 476 and 477 of the Revised Statutes, relating to patent fees, and it was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

REFUND OF DIRECT TAX OF 1861.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the special order.

Mr. OATES. I move that the House take a recess until 5 o'clock this evening.

Mr. WEAVER. I move to amend that motion by striking out "5 o'clock" and inserting "4 o'clock."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. And I move an amendment to the amendment that the recess be taken until 4.30 o'clock.

Mr. WEAVER. Pending those motions I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. BELDEN, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. JONES with Mr. LA FOLLETTE, for the remainder of the day.

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. HOUK, for the remainder of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

The SPEAKER. Under a ruling heretofore made in the House, that motion is not in order. The point was made during the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress that a motion to reconsider a vote by which the House refused to adjourn was not in order, and the point was sustained by the Chair, and that has been the ruling ever since. The reason is that the motion to adjourn can be repeated again and again after other business has intervened. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER], which is to take the recess until half-past 4 o'clock instead of until 4.

Mr. OATES. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. A motion to lay an amendment on the table is not in order.

Mr. OATES. Then I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move to lay the motion and the amendments on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. It is not in order to move to lay a motion to adjourn or a motion for a recess upon the table. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, and the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

A division was called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 62.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] to act as tellers.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 3, nays 177, not voting 144; as follows:

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

Mr. OATES and Mr. HOUK objected.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I move to amend the pending motion by striking out "4 o'clock" and inserting "10 o'clock to-morrow morning;" and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER stated the motion of Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. On my motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. DIBBLE. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. OATES. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday next.

Mr. BAYNE. That is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, a motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn has priority over a motion to adjourn and over a motion to take a recess. The gentleman from Alabama moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move to amend that motion by fixing Friday next at 10 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That would involve a change of the rules, and would not be in order.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Alabama by striking out "Friday" and inserting "Saturday."

The SPEAKER having put the question on the motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. DIBBLE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 52 voting in favor thereof.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative, there being—yeas 1, nays 187; not voting, 136; as follows:

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I object.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. MCCOMAS, for the rest of the day.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

TARIFF ON WORSTED YARNS, ETC.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Before the question is taken on the pending motion, I would like unanimous consent to present a petition, signed by eleven thousand operatives employed throughout the United States in the manufacture of worsted yarns and goods containing worsted yarns, praying more effectual protection to establishments manufacturing or using such yarns. I desire that the body of the petition, without the names, be read, and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6879) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to Anson Rudd, of the State of Colorado, certain real estate in the county of Fremont, in said State.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the (S. 325) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company the right of way through the Crow Indian reservation; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

So the House refused that when it adjourns to-day it will adjourn to meet on Friday next.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BAYNE moved to dispense with the reading of the names.

Mr. OATES objected.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. LANHAM, on this vote.

On all political questions for the rest of the day:

Mr. HATCH with Mr. FUNSTON.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. WADE.

Mr. HUTTON with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. FORD with Mr. LAIRD.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. WOODBURN.

Mr. WILSON with Mr. KETCHAM, on the direct-tax bill. If present, Mr. KETCHAM would vote for the bill and Mr. WILSON would vote against it.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. OATES. I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is pending. The gentleman moved that the House adjourn, and pending that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next. The question now recurs on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] to withdraw his objection to the presentation of the petition of 11,000 operatives of woolen mills in the city of Philadelphia so it may be printed in the RECORD without the names.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will say there will be no objection if I be allowed to have printed in the RECORD—I do not care about it being read—a petition of workingmen and of some Knights of Labor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to printing these petitions in the RECORD?

Mr. WHEELER. How long are they?

Mr. TAULBEE. I do not object to printing in the RECORD, but I do object to discussion.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded by several gentlemen.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. There is no objection to printing in the RECORD, but we are too busy to have much reading. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 152, not voting 125; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. MOORE, on this bill.

Mr. MCRAE with Mr. MCKENNA, for this day on this bill.

Mr. BRYCE with Mr. OWEN, for the rest of the day.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2927) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tenn.

REFUND OF DIRECT TAX OF 1861.

Mr. WEAVER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. TAULBEE. Is not that too long?

Mr. WEAVER. No, it is not. It is only three legislative days.

Mr. TAULBEE. I make the point of order against that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAULBEE. It is more than three days.

The SPEAKER. It is exactly three legislative days—Thursday, Friday, and Saturday.

Mr. CANNON. But this is Wednesday, and you can not include the one and exclude the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the clause of the Constitution to be read.

Mr. TAULBEE. My point of order is this: That if the House adjourns now to meet on Monday, this being Wednesday, that it is more than the three legislative days provided in the Constitution. It is necessarily four days if you count either to-day or Monday.

The SPEAKER. But the question is whether or not you can count either day.

Mr. TAULBEE. Well, that is simply a matter of taste. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the clause of the Constitution regulating this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 5, clause 4: Neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

The SPEAKER. The language is for more than three days.

Mr. TAULBEE. My point, however, Mr. Speaker, is this, that if the House adjourns now to meet again to-morrow, that is an adjournment for one day. If we adjourn to meet on Friday, that is two days; and if to meet on Saturday, that is three days. That is as far as an adjournment can extend without the concurrence of the Senate under the clause of the Constitution which has been read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is not in order at this time, for a different reason than that suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The last vote preceding the one just taken was on a motion to adjourn over until Friday; and it has been decided, and has been the constant practice of the House since that decision that, although the motion to adjourn over may be repeated, some intervening business must have taken place before the motion can be again in order; and it has been held that the motion to adjourn is not such intervening business as makes a repetition of the motion to adjourn over in order. The only vote taken by the House since the motion to adjourn over was rejected was on the motion to adjourn which has just been taken. The Chair thinks the point of order——

Mr. TAULBEE. The Chair sustains my point of order, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that it is necessary to decide upon the point urged by the gentleman, as there is another ground upon which the motion can not be entertained.

Mr. TAULBEE. That was my first point of order.

Mr. WEAVER. I move that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion for a recess pending and two amendments to the motion, which is the limit of amendments in that direction.

The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] that when the House takes a recess to-day it be until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. OATES. Is it not amendable?

The SPEAKER. It is not, being now in the third degree—an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REED. This is a final vote on that question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio had demanded the previous question upon the motion.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I withdraw that demand.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I renew it.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that it is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. REED. The only object of the previous question is to limit debate. That is already limited by the rules of the House on this question.

The SPEAKER. There is no amendment that can be offered now.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered, as gentlemen want it. [Cries of "Regular order!"] Now hold on, I am with you.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I demand the yeas and nays on the pending motion.

Mr. REED. That is on the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But I have renewed the demand for the previous question.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that it is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REED. Under the rules of the House this question is to be decided without debate. The object of the previous question is to close debate and bring the House to a direct vote upon the pending proposition. If there can be no debate, how can there be a previous question?

The SPEAKER. That may be a good reason why the House should refuse to order the previous question, but the motion for the previous question is in order.

Mr. LONG. Is it not a well-established principle of parliamentary law that one of these subsidiary motions can not be applied to another? That, for instance, the previous question can not be applied to the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. But the previous question can be applied to such motions as to commit or on a motion for a recess——

Mr. LONG. But not on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. REED. We are now on a motion that is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. The original motion for a recess is amendable; but the previous question, if ordered now, would operate upon the whole series of motions, first upon the pending amendments and then upon the original motion; so that when the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is disposed of by a vote of the House, the House will be brought to a direct vote upon the main question, which would not then be subject to further amendment if the previous question is now ordered.

Mr. REED. Then, if the previous question covers such motions, I renew the demand. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. REED and Mr. TAULBEE renewed the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I desire to ask a question for information.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] be excused from voting on the pending question.

Mr. REED. I withdraw the motion for the previous question. I do not wish to embarrass those gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question being withdrawn, the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I made a privileged motion, that the gentleman from Tennessee be excused from voting on the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asked to have a gentleman excused from voting on the pending question, which at that time was the demand for the previous question, but that was withdrawn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. My motion was that the gentleman from Tennessee be excused from voting on the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The question then pending was withdrawn. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I now renew the motion that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] be excused from voting on the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas moves that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] be excused from voting on the pending question.

Mr. BAYNE. I object.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I make the motion under Rule VIII; it is not a request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas moves that the gentleman from Tennessee be excused from voting.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, the Speaker stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 69.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, and Mr. MASON.

Before the count by tellers was completed,

Mr. CASWELL said: I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CASWELL. Is it in order to excuse a member from voting on a motion for a recess?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order to excuse a member from voting.

Mr. BLOUNT. Would it not be in order to ask that the gentleman from Tennessee be heard?

Mr. REED. I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. If the point of order is made that the House is voting——

Mr. CASWELL. I make my point of order under Rule IX, which I shall read.

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only, and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

The SPEAKER. But this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. CASWELL. Then how does it intervene at this time?

The SPEAKER. Because the rule directs that a member shall vote on each question put, unless he is excused by the House. And it is also provided that the motion to excuse him shall be made before division or the commencement of the roll-call. A motion to take a recess is not a question of privilege.

Mr. CASWELL. Is a motion to excuse a member from voting a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. It is a motion under the rules of the House, and must be made at a certain time. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas is in order.

Mr. SOWDEN. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is paired, which of itself excuses him from voting.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to repeated decisions bearing upon this question. I will read the statement in the Digest of Parliamentary Law, which is very brief.

It is not in order to ask to be excused from voting on a motion to adjourn, or to adjourn over, nor after the main question is ordered, nor pending the demand for the previous question. If it were otherwise, motions might be made one after another, and the House might be voting upon repeated questions of motions to excuse, etc., when a majority of the House were in favor of adjourning.

Mr. REED. I made that point of order at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. This is not a motion to adjourn or a motion to adjourn over, but a motion for a recess; and the question is on an amendment to that motion. Upon that the gentleman from Arkansas asks that the gentleman from Tennessee be excused from voting.

Mr. REED. The same principle must govern.

Mr. BURROWS. If a motion to excuse a member from voting on a motion to adjourn is not in order, neither should it be in order for a motion to take a recess; for the reason that if admissible then it could be made to apply to every member in the House and arrest all business.

The SPEAKER. That may be an inconvenience resulting from the rule; but if the motion can be made under the rule it is in order.

Mr. REED. I have never known a motion of this kind to be entertained while I have been in the House.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It might be a very useful motion for the majority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not remember such a motion. Still the rules provide for it.

Mr. BURROWS. If it be true that a motion is in order to excuse a member from voting on a motion to take a recess, can not the motion to excuse be made with reference to every member of the House?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; and it could be upon any other question as well.

Mr. BURROWS. So that there could be brought about the very condition of things which, according to the decision I have read, can not be brought about.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read the first paragraph of Rule VIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every member shall be present within the hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless on motion made before division or the commencement of roll-call, and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

The SPEAKER. Now, it has been held that this does not apply in the case of a motion to adjourn or to adjourn over or for a call of the House; and the reason seems to be that if the motion to excuse members from voting were entertained in such a case it might be in the power of a member to prevent the House from adjourning at all, or from compelling the attendance of members, and thus the House might be kept in session indefinitely or be destroyed as a legislative body. Those reasons do not apply on the question of taking a recess.

Mr. BURROWS. The admission of these motions indefinitely might prevent the House from taking a recess.

The SPEAKER. But the House is not prevented from adjourning and thereby terminating its sitting.

Mr. BURROWS. But the principle is the same.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The ruling referred to by the gentleman has never been held except in the cases specified, and the rule itself is very broad. It does not make any exception. The decisions which the gentleman from Michigan cites are exceptions to the rule—exceptions which have never been carried beyond motions to adjourn and to adjourn over and for calls of the House.

Mr. BURROWS. It was so held in the case of adjournment over.

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I trust I may be allowed to make a suggestion to the Chair on this point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, however, that the point of order in this case is made too late, because the House is actually voting upon the question; but if any further request should be made——

Mr. REED. I made the point of order before the count began.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. REED. Oh yes; I made it, and the Chair decided I was out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR].

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Under this same rule, which did not in terms exclude the question of voting on an adjournment, the Speaker held that, because of the reason of the thing, the rule could not apply to that sort of a case. This exception is not made in the wording of the rule. It is made by the construction which the Speaker gave to the rule as it now stands. Now, does not the very same reason in substance apply in the present case? Has the Speaker of this body less power in the construction of a rule than a court has in the construction of a law? In either case, must not the construction be based upon good sense and be in accordance with the intention of the body that framed the rule or the law? Are we bound hand and foot by a meaningless rule? Are we not at liberty to put a reasonable construction upon it? A Speaker of this House having adopted a principle of construction in one case now, when another case of like kind comes before the Chair, is not the precedent already established—one which the Speaker ought to respect?

Unless the principle of construction already adopted be applied in this case, what will be the result in regard to business of the House in regard to other measures which may come up? Is this the only bill before this House, or the only one that ever will be before it? These gentlemen who are pressing this matter may take notice that it is not.

Mr. REED. I beg to submit to the Speaker another suggestion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. One word upon the question of order. There are 145 members of the minority in this House. If it is to be held that on any question the House may be prevented from coming to a direct vote by proceedings of this kind, then there may be 650 roll-calls upon the primary question which can be made upon motions to excuse members of the House from voting, and would consume seventy days of five hours; and those motions may be indefinitely extended. And I give notice now that if this ruling is upheld, if God spares my life, and if I can get members of the minority to stand with me, this proceeding will be resorted to upon questions that will affect the majority most materially.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] has not asked to be excused.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] moved to excuse the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. REED. Had he the right to do that? Is there any right for one gentleman to move to excuse another?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes a gentleman can make any proper parliamentary motion he desires.

Mr. REED. Can that be a proper parliamentary motion at this time?

The SPEAKER. It was when made.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires to be excused, he has always been credited with physical and mental capacity to make such a statement himself. I suppose that could be predicated of every member of the House, and the Chair is bound to take notice of a fact so patent as that. Surely it can not be in order for another gentleman to make the request, however the Chair might decide upon a request made by the gentleman himself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not go into those matters.

Mr. REED. The proposition to be excused from voting is a personal right or privilege, and it can not be that one gentleman can move to excuse another, apparently without his consent.

Mr. SOWDEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has the Chair decided the question of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has indicated its opinion on the question.

Mr. SOWDEN. If the Chair has decided the question, I appeal from the decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state, in response to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR] that the argument made would of course apply not only to this case but to every case in which a member might ask to be excused from voting. Now, in the case of a motion to adjourn the Chair decided to-day that the vote on such a motion could not be reconsidered, for the reason that the motion might be repeated again and again for an indefinite number of times, provided there had been intervening business. In other words, the reason of the rule which allows in general motions to reconsider did not apply. The motion to take a recess is one which may also be repeated; but when it is renewed a different time must be fixed. A motion to amend so as to take a recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, whether carried or rejected, could not be repeated, though other business may have intervened. So the motion to take a recess is not like a motion to adjourn. The House must at all times have it in its power to determine whether it will adjourn or not—whether it will adjourn from day to day or adjourn to a particular day in the future.

The exercise of this power might be defeated absolutely if during the pendency of such a motion the time of the House could be consumed by repeated motions to excuse members from voting. But the Chair does not see how that consideration can apply to a motion to take a recess any more than to any other ordinary question pending before the House. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] takes an appeal. The Chair will be very glad to have the judgment of the House upon the matter. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER said: The noes seem to have it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 60, noes 65.

Mr. MCCREARY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that we are voting on a question of yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Still there is an appeal taken.

Mr. REED. The yeas and nays have been ordered on another question.

The SPEAKER. But if the gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to take an appeal, the House must have the right to vote on it in the usual way. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Tennessee be excused from voting on this question.

The SPEAKER (having put the question) declared the motion of Mr. CANNON agreed to.

Several Members called for a division.

Mr. TAULBEE. I make the point of order that the call for a division was not made until after the result of the vote had been announced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the fact; at least the Chair did not hear the demand until after the announcement.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I rose to make the demand as the Chair was in the act of making the announcement.

Mr. OATES. So did I.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. I was on my feet for that purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I called for a division before the result was announced.

Mr. TAULBEE. As a matter of course, if any gentleman says he demanded a division before the announcement of the Chair, I agree that a division ought to be ordered; but until such statement is made I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has just stated that he made the demand, and two or three other gentlemen state that they were on their feet endeavoring to make the demand when the Chair announced the decision.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is due to myself to state that I have not sought to be relieved by the interposition of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should vote to excuse the gentleman, can he claim the constitutional right to vote notwithstanding?

Mr. REED. I insist on the point which I have made, that the request, in order to be admissible, should have been made by the gentleman himself. I want to bring this point distinctly before the House and the Chair. I believe that the question which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has just now asked is a very pertinent one—that is, if the House, upon the motion of one member, voted to excuse another member from an official act, whether it could have any effect as against the member's will. The foundation of such a request must be the wish and consent of the member himself.

The SPEAKER. But when a gentleman moves to excuse another member from voting, that gentleman being present in the Hall and not disclaiming that motion, the Chair of course proceeds on the assumption——

Mr. REED. We do not know whether he is present or not.

The SPEAKER. The presumption is that the gentleman desires to have the motion made.

Mr. REED. We do not know whether he is present or not. He has not shown himself. I submit to the Chair this is a grave question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee was certainly present in his seat when the motion was made.

Mr. REED. All I desire, Mr. Speaker, is the question may be presented intelligently.

The SPEAKER. That is all the Chair desires. The Chair has no feeling in the matter, but desires the House to give its best judgment on the question without regard to any decision of the Chair. Does the gentleman from Arkansas insist on his motion to excuse the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. No, I do not.

Mr. MCCREARY. I should like to have the Clerk read clause 1 of Rule VIII.

The SPEAKER. It was read, but it will be read again if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. MCCREARY. I do.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll-call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

Mr. LONG. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that two points of order are pending. One is the motion to excuse is not in order, and the second is that one member has not the right to move another member shall be excused.

Several MEMBERS. We can not hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. Members must resume their seats and preserve order.

Mr. LONG. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that two points of order are involved. The first is that the motion to excuse a member is not in order. The second is that one member has no right to move to excuse another member. The Chair has overruled both points of order. Under this appeal can there be a division of the question? For myself I will vote to sustain the Chair on the first point, but I will not vote to sustain the Chair on the second point. Can there be any division of the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how there can be a division, because the point of order is one entire thing.

A MEMBER. One was made by Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, and the other by Mr. REED.

Mr. REED. No, the original point was made by myself.

The SPEAKER. By the gentleman from Maine——

Mr. REED. I did it on one ground.

The SPEAKER. The point is one entire thing.

Mr. REED. Indivisible.

The SPEAKER. The point of the gentleman from Michigan was argument made in support of the point of order.

Mr. REED. That is all.

The SPEAKER. One reason may be good and the other bad.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Will the Chair state the point of order involved?

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Can we not have a statement of what is involved in the question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] moved that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] be excused from voting on the motion for a recess. The point was made that it was not in order under the practice of the House to excuse a member from voting on a motion to take a recess. It was urged in support of that, in the first place, there had been a ruling by the House heretofore that it was not in order to excuse a member on a motion to adjourn or to adjourn over; and, secondly, that the motion was not in order because it was made by another member, and not by the member from Tennessee himself. The Chair overruled the point of order and an appeal was taken. It is only one entire question; the others are mere matters of argument

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is the appeal debatable?

The SPEAKER. Rule I, clause 4, provides "that no member shall speak more than once on an appeal from the decision of the Chair," which implies that it is debatable.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, two questions are involved here. On one of these questions I am clear the Chair is right. The rules of this body must have an intelligent, straightforward, common-sense construction. And all questions of doubt ought to be decided so that the business of the House can proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can obviate the difficulty by consent of the House. The Chair can submit to the House the question whether it is competent for one member to move to excuse another member from voting.

Mr. LONG. Let that be done.

The SPEAKER. If that were done, the House would vote directly upon that one question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Can that be done except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can be done, if the appeal is withdrawn.

Mr. REED. It can be of course submitted by the Speaker in that form.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is not inconsistent with the practice of the House to submit questions of this character for the judgment and determination of the House; but in doing this the Chair wishes to state that there is no disposition on his part to avoid the effect of an appeal to the House, nor has the Chair any feeling as to what may be the decision of the House upon that appeal.

Mr. REED. We understand that; and this would avoid a difficulty that we all wish to avoid.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object to being taken off the floor in that way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to take the gentleman off the floor, but on the contrary has recognized him as entitled to the floor.

Mr. GROSVENOR. To my mind there is not anything plainer—it seems to me that it is so plain the man who runs can understand it—that if the Speaker is right in his first proposition——

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. SOWDEN. I want to withdraw the appeal.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But you can not take me off the floor in that way. It takes two men to do that, you and me both, and we are not operating together just now. [Laughter.] Not moving in the same direction, as it were.

If the Speaker has ruled rightly on the first proposition, that every member of this House may ask to be excused from voting on this question, then beyond all possibility of doubt the second question has been properly ruled by the Speaker. The language of the rule does not admit of a construction that repeals the language of the rule and substitutes other language in its stead. It declares expressly:

Unless, on motion, * * * he shall be excused.

Excused how? Not upon his own motion, but by the action of the House; and this is a simple attempt here to get out of a position that is absolutely absurd, for we are asked by it to admit that the first proposition is right and the second wrong. If the first position is correct, the last one is necessarily so. Because, Mr. Speaker, if every member of this House had a right to be excused by a vote of the House, then the language of that rule can not be substituted by undertaking to say that you will construe the language to mean that it is a personal privilege of a member. I have the right to ask for leave of absence for any member, and to ask that he be excused. The rule is absolutely plain in that respect, and can not be repealed by a construction like that. The member may be heard to ask that a member be granted leave of absence, or that he be excused from voting. Surely one member may state a question of privilege for another if the House is involved.

But a moment further. Is it possible that we have lived up to this time, almost one hundred years of legislative existence in this country, and have learned this in legislative matters now for the first time, that upon every question presented to this House I may be excused from voting, and if I can get one-fifth of the members of the House then present to sustain me in the demand for the yeas and nays can have 650 roll-calls of this House upon every question except the question to adjourn or to adjourn over? That is the far-reaching effect of this proposition.

I may make a motion that a particular member be excused from voting; I may renew that motion and include one by one the whole of the 325 members of the House, and if one-fifth of the members will sustain me we can have a roll-call upon each motion. On every single one of these motions I move to reconsider the vote, and that must be determined by a roll-call, if I can get the necessary number to sustain the demand, which makes 650 roll-calls, or nearly fifty days of six hours a day, and we are asked here to thus put a technical construction upon the rule of the House that will paralyze the legislation of this country and put into the hands of a minority of the House power to absolutely usurp its whole legislative functions and prevent for the whole life of a Congress any action whatever. I can not consent to such a construction.

The SPEAKER. But how does the gentleman from Ohio suppose that a member can be excused from voting? The rule evidently contemplates that he may be excused.

Mr. GROSVENOR. He can be excused upon his own motion; but he must state the reason.

The SPEAKER. But still there must be a vote upon that motion, if it is objected to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I suppose that there must be; but my proposition goes to the point that the same principle which undertakes to declare that the House shall not be unreasonably kept in session by dilatory motions like that pending applies as well to the question of a recess as to an adjournment. They stand in that regard upon the same footing, in principle, and if the Speaker is invoked here to make a judicial ruling not in consonance with the spirit of the rule, the language of which may not be absolutely specific, then, surely, Mr. Speaker, there would be no argument stronger than that the rule would be absolutely nugatory under any other construction than that I have suggested. It is a question of construction, and the construction ought to be reasonable and in the direction of going forward and not backward. That is a canon of construction of all rules of parliamentary procedure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we are making history here just now. We are putting weapons into the hands of a minority of this House absolutely destructive of the power of the people of this country to be represented in this Government at all. And I appeal to the Speaker of this House not to force the House either to overrule him—which none of us would like to do—or else to make a law for this House which will imperil every interest in the country. Such a ruling if made will perpetuate its evil consequences far along our future pathway.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not expressed an opinion as to what the rule ought to be, but has simply stated what, in his judgment, the rule actually is.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Before the Chair proceeds let me say one word more. I can not imagine an exigency where a member of the House can properly and without any factious purpose be excused from voting on a question of a recess. The very spirit of this whole matter of excusing members goes back into the great parliamentary proposition that no member of a parliamentary body shall be permitted to vote on a question in which he has an interest. It might be remotely possible that a member might have an interest in an adjournment or a recess; but I can not conceive the makers of these rules ever contemplated that such a motion could be used for any other than merely dilatory purposes.

Mr. CRISP. Let me suggest, it is not the province of the Speaker to make rules, but to construe them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. But it is the province of the Speaker, as it is of courts, to construe rules in the spirit in which they were made, and to work out the legislative intent with which they were framed.

Mr. CRISP. From the necessity of the case, of course, as a lawyer the gentleman understands, there may arise cases when there must be a construction of what appears a plain rule. From the necessity of the case it has been held that this motion to excuse a member from voting could not be made upon a motion to adjourn or a motion to adjourn over. Why? Because if it could be then the House might never adjourn, and the necessity of the case demands that construction.

But is the same thing true in regard to a recess? Suppose the House never takes a recess, what is the harm done? The necessity, therefore, for construing the rule arises here. The gentleman invokes the Speaker to make a rule. I hold it is the duty of the Presiding Officer to construe the rules we have made. If they are wrong let us change them.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We have at least a right to protest against this ruling, although we may avail ourselves of it afterwards.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It is but just I should state I was present when the motion was made by the gentleman from Arkansas. It was not made without my consent. I was and am now paired with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] until a future hour of this session. I have tried to find the pair but could not, and I did not know whether it in terms leaves me the right to vote to make a quorum when the question that no quorum has voted is made or not. The question of no quorum voting was made, and the gentleman from Arkansas moved that I be excused from voting on the pending proposition. I will not go now, of course, into the merits of that discussion. Those are the facts, and I have thought it proper I should state them to the House.

Mr. SOWDEN. I withdraw the appeal from the ruling of the Chair in order to allow the Speaker to submit to the House the question whether a motion to excuse a member who is present from voting can be made by another member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to submit to the House the question whether or not it is competent for one member to move that the House shall excuse another member from voting——

Mr. REED. Under the existing circumstances.

Mr. BOUTELLE. On a motion for a recess.

The SPEAKER. On a motion for a recess; and the Chair thinks it would apply to any other motion except those excluded by previous decisions. The rule is as follows:

Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented; and shall vote on each question put, unless, on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll-call and decided without debate, he shall be excused, or unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question.

Mr. BREWER. I ask the Chair also to read the note on page 478.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing on page 478 in the edition in the hands of the Chair relating to this question.

Mr. BREWER. I have in my hands the edition of last Congress. I send it up to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. What the gentleman from Michigan asks to be read is as follows:

On motions to adjourn, to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, and for a call of the House, it has been held not to be in order to ask to be excused from voting; and for the obvious reason that nothing but a desire to consume time, and thereby delay legislation, or to prevent a majority adjourning, could possibly influence a member in making the request. (See Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-first Congress, page 376; Journals first session Thirty-first Congress, page 1538; first session Thirty-third Congress, pages 757, 765, 854, 1243; first session, Thirty-fifth Congress, page 866; Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-ninth Congress, page 945.)

Those are the cases to which the Chair alluded.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the Chair decide that the rule implies that when a motion is made to excuse a member it must be made with his consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not now making any decision. The question which the Chair has submitted is whether it is competent for one member to move to excuse another member from voting.

Mr. REED. Under the present circumstances?

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from Tennessee is present and has assented to the motion being made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is aware of that; but the Chair does not desire to go beyond the question which he submits to the House to decide.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to inquire whether the Chair is to be understood as holding that upon a motion to take a recess a motion to excuse a member is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did so hold. The Chair entertained the motion to excuse a member from voting upon a motion to take a recess, and entertained the motion made by a gentleman other than the one to be excused.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. Speaker, it is understood that a motion to excuse a member is made only at his instance or at his request. Ordinarily a member rises and asks to be excused from voting. He never makes the motion to excuse himself. Who ever heard of such a thing? Some other member makes the motion. Now, the only point in this case about which there can be any cavil is that the gentleman did not rise in his place and request somebody else to make the motion to excuse him. He says he knew of it, and that it was made with his approbation. In all cases the motion to excuse is made by some one other than the member to be excused. Therefore there is nothing to be submitted to the House, unless we are to make a rule that a member desiring to be excused from voting must rise and request some other member to move that he be excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman himself might make a motion to excuse himself.

Mr. BUCKALEW. But I speak of the practice.

Mr. DUNN. If it is the desire of our friends on the other side to change the rule, I suggest that it would be better to make a distinct rule and adopt it regularly, so that there may be no mistake about it. We have not even a hypothetical case to go upon. I presume nobody desires to say that no member shall under any circumstances move to excuse another member. Exigencies and emergencies might arise in which that must be done, necessarily and in good faith, and not for the mere purpose of delay. It would be much more decorous, therefore, to make a rule which would prohibit that, if such is the desire of the House, than to attempt to deal with the question in this way.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, why would not a good way to get out of the difficulty be to withdraw the proposition at this time? We have stumbled upon it without preparation on the part of anybody, and there are no real rights waived by withdrawing it, because the filibustering motions—to use that language—are ample and abundant without resorting to this.

Mr. DUNN. I think so myself.

Mr. REED. In this way no rights will be lost and we shall be relieved from a question that we have come upon thus suddenly without having, perhaps, the necessary information to decide it properly. That is the spirit by which I am personally actuated in this matter. We all of us are interested, not merely in the momentary transactions which are going on here, but in preserving the discipline and good order of the House, and it is very undesirable that we should come into conflict upon such questions as this without more full and careful consideration. If we do we may get some decision which may plague us all. I feel myself, and I believe that I am speaking the sentiment of the majority of this House and, I hope, of all the members, that we should get out of this matter without establishing a precedent which may plague either the one side or the other, and, above all, interfere with the public business at some future time.

Mr. HERBERT. It seems to me that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is right; and I therefore suggest that he move an adjournment, so that we may all go home and study up this question and come back here prepared to decide it properly. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I did not intend to be facetious about the matter. Perhaps if I did, I might be as successful as the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. McCREARY. I agree with the gentleman from Maine that we have come suddenly upon a very important proposition. The appeal taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN] has been withdrawn, and the regular business, perhaps, would be to go on and take a vote upon the motion made to excuse the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN]; but as this is a very important question, one that I think is far-reaching and worthy of careful consideration, I feel that we ought to take time to consider it, and therefore I now move to adjourn. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. REED. That is not the spirit in which to receive the proposition I have made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the appeal from its decision was withdrawn with the understanding that the Chair would submit the question to the House.

Mr. McCREARY. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I desire to occupy but a moment, for the time of the House is very valuable. In my judgment, the House can not overrule the ruling or suggestion of the Speaker in this case without arriving at an absurd conclusion. The first clause of the rule provides that—

> Every member shall be present within the Hall of the House during its sittings, unless excused or necessarily prevented—

The question is as to the meaning of this word "excused"— > and shall vote on each question put, unless on motion made before division or the commencement of the roll-call and decided without debate, he shall be excused.

Now, I think every one must admit that the word "excused," as used in the second clause of this paragraph, has the same meaning as when used in the first clause. This position is in accordance with a well-known rule of construction. Now, if in construing the second clause, we arrive at the conclusion that a member can be excused only on his own motion, then we must decide that under the first clause he can be excused only on his own motion. So that a member not present could not be excused at all from attendance at the sittings of the House.

A MEMBER. Though he might be sick in bed.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I submit that according to any fair and reasonable construction of this rule the decision of the Speaker is correct. This is a matter which reaches beyond the present question—which does not terminate here; and we ought to decide it on principle.

Mr. MORGAN. When a member makes a motion in the interest of another member, it is not to be presumed that he does so at the other's request?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Of course.

Mr. MORGAN. And the rule applies—qui facit per alium, facit per se.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have stated the circumstances under which the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas was made. I rise now for the purpose of requesting him to withdraw that motion, not because it was made without my consent or knowledge originally, but because I think it the quickest solution of the trouble, and because I think that he and I would regret if there should be established here any rule which might work impropriety in the future. The Speaker's ruling is beyond all question perfectly sound. No argument can override the plain rule. But in the present temper of the House, as the Speaker has indicated a purpose to submit the question to the House, it is possible an unsound decision might be made, and I am desirous that whatever rulings may be made here shall be the correct rules for the proper government of this body. The rule is plain, and can not be made clearer by construction. I have tried under all circumstances to recognize in my action here the rules of the House and the Constitution under which they are framed, and shall at all times continue to do so. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will withdraw the motion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There would be nothing gained by that. Nothing will be settled.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, of course my withdrawal of the motion can not alter the language of the rule or effect any permanent settlement of this question. I have no desire, however, to persist in any motion which may work any particular inconvenience. Of course gentlemen understand that I am frankly and positively opposed to the bill we have under consideration.

The rule declares its meaning in express terms. Nothing is dependent upon implication. It is equally clear that in the rulings of the various occupants of the Chair, beginning, I think, back in the Thirty-second Congress, no exception has been made upon this question, except where the rule seemed to conflict with the constitutional power of the House to adjourn. But as a measure bearing upon this moment, without having, so far as I can see, any permanent bearing, I withdraw the motion which I made that the gentleman from Tennessee be excused from voting. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry; and I want to be heard as fairly as the gentleman from Arkansas has been. I simply wish to inquire now of the Chair whether the ruling which the Chair has made, which, if unappealed from, becomes a rule of the House, is understood to stand, notwithstanding the withdrawal of the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair supposes, all that has been said here will stand on record as a part of the proceedings of the House. So far as the present occupant of the Chair is concerned, he desires to say he would not hesitate to give this question a very thorough re-examination if it should be again presented. As has already been remarked, the question arose suddenly and unexpectedly. The Chair has given his best judgment from the examination made.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I only wanted to say——

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand the Chair to have decided anything except that the mere motion was in order.

The SPEAKER. That is all that the Chair decided. The Chair entertained the motion.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll upon the question of agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, which is that the House take a recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I call for the enforcement of paragraph 7 of Rule XIV. If we are to stay here all night, we want to have the air of the Hall as pure as possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey, as the Chair understands, calls for the enforcement of the rule which prohibits smoking in the Hall. The officers of the House will enforce the rule.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. The House will please come to order, so the Chair can proceed regularly with the business.

It is in order. It has been frequently decided, as gentlemen will find by looking at the Digest, that ordering the yeas and nays on a pending proposition is itself sufficient intervening business to justify a repetition of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Pending that, I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. REED. Is that in order pending the roll-call.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to amend by inserting that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. And I move to amend so that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

Mr. REED. Is that in order during the call of the roll?

The SPEAKER. There has been no call of the roll.

Mr. REED. Is it in order to amend pending the call of the roll?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will refer to the decisions. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to adjourn may be repeated, although no question has been put and decided since the former motion—Journal, first session Twenty-third Congress, page 651—but there must be some intervening business. A motion to adjourn over can not be repeated unless there has been intervening business, and a motion to adjourn is not such business.

Mr. REED. Is it in order to move to adjourn over during a roll-call?

The SPEAKER. It has priority over a motion to adjourn.

Mr. LONG. Has not the House once already refused to adjourn over?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. LONG. When the House has refused to adjourn over can that motion be repeated?

The SPEAKER. It has been decided frequently that the House has it always in its power to adjourn over just as it has to adjourn, and the same motion may be repeated.

Mr. LONG. It is stated in the Digest that a motion to postpone to a day certain being decided adversely, it shall not be repeated.

The SPEAKER. That is, a motion to postpone bills or other propositions. This is a motion to adjourn over to Saturday next.

Mr. REED. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 0, nays 142, not voting 182; as follows:

YEAS—0.

NAYS—142.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon ordering a call of the House, but pending that the Chair desires to lay before the House the following requests for leave:

Mr. FORAN asks to be excused for the remainder of this day, on account of illness; Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, on account of sickness, and Mr. KELLEY, also on account of sickness.

If there be no objection, these requests will be granted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire leave of absence for this evening, on account of sickness. I have not been well since Saturday.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My colleague [Mr. GLASS] is in ill health, and has paired and gone home. It is very seldom that he has been able to attend night sessions. He requested me, if there was a call of the House, to make this statement, and ask that he be granted leave of absence from the night session.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think that is exactly fair. I have no objection to leave being granted to the gentleman himself, but his absence also takes one vote from this side of the House—the member who is paired with him.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The other man is also sick, and has gone home—my colleague, Mr. HOUK. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS was excused.

Mr. BRYCE. My colleague, Mr. COX, who is ill, requested me to ask that he be excused in case of a call of the House.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My colleague, Mr. PHELPS, has been called home by the accidental burning of his residence; and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask that my colleague, Mr. ADAMS, be excused on account of his absence in Chicago.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has leave of absence the request to excuse him is not necessary.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I do not know that he has. He was called away suddenly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to excusing the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS], he being absent from the city?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask that my colleague, Mr. CULBERSON, be excused on account of illness. He went home this afternoon. I also ask an excuse for my colleague, Mr. MILLS, who is known to be sick.

There was no objection.

Mr. PEEL. I ask an excuse for my colleague, Mr. MCRAE, on account of illness in his family.

There was no objection.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I ask that Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, be excused on account of sickness.

Several MEMBERS. Mr. ALLEN is present.

Mr. OATES. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering a call of the House.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. OATES. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 24.

Mr. OATES. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OATES. I call for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, has the call developed the presence of a quorum?
The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixteen members have responded to their names.
Mr. REED. Then a quorum is in attendance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the gentleman comes within the exception.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, has voted on this question?

The SPEAKER. The names have just been read; but the Chair thinks the gentleman from Mississippi did not vote.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then I wish to withdraw my vote, inasmuch as I am paired with him, unless the withdrawal breaks a quorum.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum with the vote or without the vote of the gentleman.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Does this last vote, announced by the Chair, indicate the presence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum present.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. DIBBLE. I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state the reason?

The Chair understands that, according to the practice and the rules of the House, when the roll-call discloses the fact that no quorum is present, but two motions are in order—for a call of the House, and to adjourn. The Chair does not think it required a quorum to determine the last vote taken, but the roll-call disclosed the fact that no quorum is present.

Mr. REED. But we have just had a call of the House, which disclosed the fact that there were 216 members present.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but when a vote is taken by yeas and nays that shows no quorum to be present, the House must take cognizance of the fact.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, in the Thirty-third Congress—and I quote from the Journal of the first session of that Congress—Mr. Ezra Washburn, jr., moved a call of the House. The Speaker decided that motion to be out of order on the ground that the House had already, since the demand for the previous question, which was still pending, refused a call, and thereby indicated a fixed purpose to vote upon the main question without a call.

That was after the refusal of the House to adjourn. It seems to me that the House having now suspended proceedings under the call, and having refused to reconsider that vote, it would not be in order to renew the motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair does not see how the House can, when the record of a vote shows that no quorum is present, transact any other business except to proceed to a call of the House or to adjourn.

The proceedings to which the gentleman refers are also different from these. There the House had just refused to order a call.

Mr. DIBBLE. The motion to adjourn would not be in order after it had just been voted down, and I do not see how you can repeat the motion for a call of the House under that ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is always and necessarily in the power of the House to compel the attendance of its absent members for the transaction of the public business. The last vote discloses the fact that no quorum is present, which fact the Chair thinks may be disclosed a dozen times during a legislative day, and yet it must be always in the power of the House, in the event of the absence of a quorum, to enforce the attendance of its members. To deprive the House of that power would destroy its functions as a legislative body.

Mr. BURROWS. May I ask to have the Clerk read upon this point an important decision for the information of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it to the desk.

Mr. BURROWS. And I would like to have the attention of the House while it is being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is the duty of the House, especially in times of difficulty, to compel the attendance of members by frequent calls, and not permit the indolence, inattention, or love of amusement on the part of any to leave the most important and interesting questions to be discussed and decided in Houses from which many are absent.

[Applause.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Does the Chair hold the motion for a call of the House to be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order. The House can not proceed to transact any other business in the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that we can not come to a conclusion upon this subject to-night; and I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BURROWS. Is that motion not already pending?

The SPEAKER. It is pending in the House when a quorum is present; but, pending that motion, the gentleman from Arkansas moved that when the House adjourns it be to meet on Monday; the gentleman from Tennessee moved to amend by adjourning until Friday, and the gentleman from Illinois to amend that so as to adjourn to Saturday. The vote was taken and disclosed the fact that only 140 members were present. Thereupon a call of the House was ordered. Now, the last vote discloses the fact that there is no quorum present, and there are but two motions before the House.

Mr. BURROWS. I did not know but that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee was still pending.

The SPEAKER. It is pending at the time when there is a quorum in the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. And we will vote on it when there is a quorum present.

Mr. BURROWS. It does not require a quorum to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum to vote on the motion to adjourn, it is true; but the amendments fixing the day to which the House shall adjourn require a quorum, and the House can not come to a direct vote upon the original motion because of the fact that there was no quorum present upon the vote on the first amendment.

Mr. BURROWS. But that was a motion to adjourn, and we now have two motions to adjourn pending.

The SPEAKER. The House can not now vote on the questions which had priority, because they are questions the decision of which requires a majority of the House; and there is no majority of the House present according to the record. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman knows of his own knowledge that that is so I shall have no objection, but I understand that quite a number of gentlemen who have been excused by the House to-night on account of sickness are at a dinner party, and quite a large number are at the theater.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman I would say that my colleague was here until half an hour ago, and he told me that he was suffering from a severe headache——

Mr. O'NEALL, of Indiana: No excuse offered.

Mr. PATTON.

Mr. MAISH. My colleague, Mr. PATTON, requested me to inform the House that he was absent on account of sickness in his family. I ask that he be excused.

There being no objection, Mr. PATTON was excused.

Mr. PAYSON.

Mr. MASON. My colleague, Mr. PAYSON, left the Hall just now, stating that he was called home on account of sickness in his family, and he requested me to ask that he be excused.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the question to the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] moves that his colleague [Mr. PAYSON], who, he states, is absent on account of sickness in his family, be excused from further attendance.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. This illness is too intermittent.

The question being taken on the motion to excuse Mr. PAYSON, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 80, noes 53.

Mr. PEEL: No excuse offered.

Mr. PERKINS: No excuse offered.

Mr. PERRY: No excuse offered.

There being no objection, Mr. THOMPSON, of California, was excused.

Mr. VANDEVER.

Mr. MORROW. I ask, Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. VANDEVER,

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution seems to be adopted.

Mr. OATES. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 11,

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAFFOON. I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. LAFFOON. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 103.

Mr. LAFFOON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 24, nays 128, not voting 172; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call,

Mr. SOWDEN said: In the name of humanity, I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Segeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the House.

Mr. LAFFOON. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COLLINS] asks to be excused from further attendance upon this night's session on account of sickness.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object. What is the ground for asking excuse?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That he is not well enough to remain longer in the House.

Mr. STAHLNECKER. I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TARSNEY. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up for consideration House bill 1439, in relation to the eight-hour law. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Regular order.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that my colleague, Mr. WHITING, be excused from further attendance at this night's session.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that the time for excuses has passed and that these motions are not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is always in the power of the House to excuse a member.

Mr. DAVIS. My colleague, Mr. WHITING, was too ill to remain in the Hall, and I advised him to go home.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DAVIS's motion was agreed to, and Mr. WHITING was excused.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There seems to be so much illness there ought to be some investigation to learn the cause of and provide some remedy against the present unhealthy condition of the members of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWLES. I move that my colleague, Mr. ROWLAND, be excused from further attendance on this night's session. He has been sick for a month.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

A MEMBER. I object.

Mr. HATCH. I make the point that no gentleman has risen in his place to object.

Mr. TARSNEY. I object.

Mr. McCREARY. It will take some time to execute the order of the House, and I therefore move to take a recess for one hour. In addition, the clerks need rest.

A MEMBER. Make it 10 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. TARSNEY. I object. I tried to get the House to proceed with the consideration of the eight-hour law and it was objected to.

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen will resume their seats the Chair will again submit the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] to the House, so it may be seen who objects to it.

Mr. TARSNEY. I object.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point of order that the gentleman is reported absent and is not supposed to be here for the purpose of objecting to anything. He made no excuse for his absence, as I understand, when the roll was called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know, in the first place, that the gentleman was absent, and he answered to his name on the call of the roll, as the Clerk informs the Chair.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, but he was absent before that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] asks unanimous consent that a recess be taken for one hour.

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. COWLES. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COWLES. I would like to know if we are proceeding under the eight-hour law. [Laughter.] And if so, if this is a specimen of its operations?

Mr. SHAW. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. TARSNEY. I object, because to-morrow has been set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. REED. But to-morrow will not come. It will be to-day under this arrangement. The gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. TARSNEY. I will withdraw any objection if the House will consider the regular order fixed for to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. REED. There is no proposition of that sort.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it in order to inform the gentleman from Michigan that to-morrow will never come? There will be no to-morrow.

Mr. DE LANO. Pending this proceeding I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done at this time.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Do I understand that the House excused the gentleman from North Carolina?

The SPEAKER. Which gentleman?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. ROWLAND.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman was excused.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I would ask, then, if it would not be proper to excuse also the gentleman from South Carolina, and let them go out together. [Laughter.]

Mr. MASON. I make the point of order that neither is a "governor."

Mr. MACDONALD. I object to any more members being sick.

Mr. STRUBLE. I ask unanimous consent, while the House is waiting, to call up for present consideration the bill I send to the desk.

Mr. STEELE. But the gentleman is absent sick, and was excused this evening.

Mr. STRUBLE. The gentleman is mistaken. I have not been sick for a long while. [Cries of "Regular order!"] This is only a public-building bill, and I would like to be recognized for the purpose of getting it before the House for consideration. It is an important matter.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to see the record, to find out if the gentleman is not absent sick.

The SPEAKER. No business can be transacted during the call of the House.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, if in order, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] be given one hour in which to address the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. Is that in order? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Speaker, if it be in order, I move that the further consideration of the pending bill be postponed until the 19th day of May, in order that we may proceed with the business from the Commerce Committee this day.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order pending the call of the House.

Mr. TARSNEY. Then I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that the motion is not now admissible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The last vote taken by the House was on the motion to adjourn, and no business has intervened.

Mr. TARSNEY. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. WHEELER (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes a. m. Thursday). I move that all members of this House who have been in constant attendance since 12 o'clock to-day be excused for six hours. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. That would excuse everybody present who has been here for ten minutes.

Mr. WHEELER. I will amend by saying all members who have been in attendance for twelve hours.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order that the motion can not be entertained.

Mr. MASON. The eight-hour law does not apply here.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce have the next day that is not already assigned by some special order in lieu of the day fixed, and that the House now take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. TARSNEY. When is that day?

Mr. STEELE. The first day that is not occupied.

Mr. TARSNEY. I object to that. It is too indefinite. Give us next Friday, and I will consent.

Mr. TAULBEE. I shall object to assigning Friday in that way.

Mr. GUENTHER. Suppose we give you this day after this matter is disposed of?

Mr. TARSNEY. That day will come about next September, and I object to that arrangement.

Mr. STEELE. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be given Friday.

Mr. TAULBEE. I object.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the consideration of the House bill which I will send to the desk. I ask for its immediate consideration in the House. It is a purely local measure, and nobody is interested in it. [Laughter.] I think there will be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The request is not in order during a call of the House.

Mr. STRUBLE. I found that out a few moments ago.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the bill be read for the information of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. I thought it might dignify the proceedings of the session if we were to do something.

Mr. MAISH. My colleague [Mr. ERMENTROUT] informs the Sergeant-at-Arms that he is ill. I move that he be excused from further attendance at this sitting of the House.

Objection was made.

Mr. MAISH. I move that my colleague be excused.

Mr. STRUBLE. Is the gentleman present?

Mr. MAISH. No, sir.

Mr. STRUBLE. How does the gentleman know that his colleague is sick?

Mr. MAISH. The Sergeant-at-Arms has reported that he was so informed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Deputy Sergeant-at Arms appeared at the bar having in his custody Mr. DOUGHERTY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. DOUGHERTY, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. The excuse I have to offer is that for some weeks I have been suffering from malaria. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. Who is your doctor?

Mr. DOUGHERTY. And, unlike most of these statesmen who are laughing, I did not get that malaria out of the bottle, either. I will say that last night I had a chill and I have not been feeling well all day.

Mr. BURROWS. How do you feel now?

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the gentleman from Florida be excused.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I ask, should not that motion be suspended until we get the explanation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed the gentleman had completed his statement.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I was asked the question by one of these gentlemen how I felt now; and I will state I probably feel better than he would if he had been through what I have. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the gentleman from Florida be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOUGHERTY. Does that excuse by the House enable me to go back to my hotel?

Mr. TAULBEE. I move that the gentleman from Florida be excused from further attendance on the session of this day on account of the state of his health. I think we may dispense with levity in matters so grave.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the gentleman from Florida be excused from further attendance at this session of the House.

The question being put, the motion was agreed to—ayes 72, noes 2.

Mr. TARSNEY. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. LAFFOON moved to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. DOCKERY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. DOCKERY, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DOCKERY. I have none, Mr. Speaker.

[Cries of "Louder!" "Louder!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri says he has no excuse to offer.

Mr. WEBER. I move that the gentleman be excused; he is honest.

Mr. MANSUR. I move that he be excused for being absent; but that he be fined 1 cent for being caught.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move to amend that motion by providing that the fine be appropriated for refunding the direct tax.

Mr. GUENTHER. Would it be in order to move to amend by providing that the fine shall go to the State treasury of Kentucky?

Mr. TAULBEE. Is the motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order, because the House has no power to make such an appropriation of the fine while it is sitting under a call of the House.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the gentleman from Missouri be excused.

Mr. STRUBLE. I will agree to that on condition that he remain.

The question being put, the motion to excuse Mr. DOCKERY was agreed to—ayes 75, noes 8.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, overtures have been made by gentlemen on both sides of this question for a recess, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not object to it. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until a quarter before 12 o'clock to-day.

The SPEAKER. It will be necessary to dispense with further proceedings under the call before the request can be put in that form, and, of course, if one part fails it will all fail. Taking a recess is the transaction of business.

Mr. REED. Make it 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] asks unanimous consent that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with and a recess taken until a quarter before 12 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I think that if the gentleman will propose a recess until 11 o'clock there will be no objection.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Half past 11.

Mr. REED. Yes; make it 11.30.

Mr. OATES. Fifteen minutes before 12 o'clock is time enough.

Several MEMBERS. Make it half past 11.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. VANCE. I object.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further proceedings under the call, and to take a recess until half past 11 o'clock this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] asks unanimous consent that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, and that the House take a recess until half past 11 o'clock.

Mr. VANCE and others objected.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call; and I give notice that if that carries I will immediately move to take a recess until a quarter before 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is aware of the fact that that will require a quorum, and there is no quorum present. Objection is made, and the proposition is no more likely to prevail in that form than by unanimous consent. The Chair will put the question, however.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Is it in order at this time, inasmuch as certain delinquent members have been brought before the bar of the House, to have another call to determine whether there is a quorum present? If there is a quorum, then it is in order for the House to take a recess, and——

The SPEAKER. But the House can not take a recess with the call pending. It must first dispense with the proceedings under the call.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. I understand that; but if we first determine that we have a quorum here, we can then proceed to do whatever is necessary.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, with the view of making some satisfactory arrangement of this matter, I propose that unanimous consent be given to dispense with further proceedings under the call, that a recess be taken until 11 o'clock to-day, that two hours be then allowed for general debate upon this bill, and two hours more for amendments and debate under the five-minute rule, and that at 3 o'clock the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR]?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the roll be called to ascertain whether we have a quorum in the House.

Mr. SOWDEN. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]?

Mr. SOWDEN. I object.

Mr. BRUMM. I object.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further proceedings under the call, and that the House take a recess until 11 o'clock.

Several members objected.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, without disturbing the status in any way, there be an informal call of the roll, simply to ascertain the number of members present.

The SPEAKER. That request has just been made and objected to.

Mr. DIBBLE. I do not think it was understood that the proceeding was to be informal and without disturbing the existing status.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put it in that form. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that, without disturbing or dispensing with proceedings under the call, the roll be called for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a quorum is present. Is there objection?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I hope no objection will be made.

A MEMBER. What is the object?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us know what the object is.

Mr. DIBBLE. I think, if a quorum be present, members will almost unanimously consent to a vote or a proposition which will relieve us from the present embarrassing posture of affairs—a proposition for a recess to some of the hours which have been named.

A MEMBER. On what condition?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. FITCH. I object.

Mr. SOWDEN. I ask that the rule in reference to smoking in the Hall be enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will see that the rule is strictly enforced.

The Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in his custody Mr. LATHAM, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. PERRY, and Mr. COTHRAN.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I ask that these gentlemen be tried one at a time.

Mr. TAULBEE. I make the point that it is the prerogative of the defendants to sever the trial.

The SPEAKER. Mr. LATHAM, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an excuse.——

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a point of order. There are so many gentlemen in the rear that we can not see the culprits. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, by way of excuse, I have this to say, that I have been backing seed to my constituents.

The SPEAKER. Proceedings will be suspended until gentlemen take their seats and order is restored. [A pause.] The gentleman from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. LATHAM. I have two excuses to make, Mr. Speaker. The first is that I have been engaged in the duties—— [Cries of "Louder!"]

Mr. TAULBEE. I make the point of order that two of those gentlemen are from South Carolina and two from North Carolina; and——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina will proceed with his statement.

Mr. LATHAM. I have been sending off seeds to my constituents. [Cries of "Louder!"]

The SPEAKER. If the House does not intend to deal with these gentlemen under the rules it might as well be so understood and the gentlemen be permitted to take their seats.

A MEMBER. Let them take their seats.

The SPEAKER. The rules require the Chair, when gentlemen are brought here by the Sergeant-at-Arms, to call upon them to state their excuses, if they have any, for their absence. The Chair thinks these gentlemen ought to have the right to make their excuses.

Mr. LATHAM. I was paired to-day with Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I did not know there would be any call of the House. I had other business for my constituents—to send off seed.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I move that the gentleman from North Carolina be excused.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to amend the motion by adding "upon payment of a fine of $5,000." [Laughter.]

Mr. LATHAM. I can not pay it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the gentleman from North Carolina be excused upon payment of a fine of $5,000.

The motion of Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, was not agreed to.

Mr. BELDEN. Make it $4,500.

The SPEAKER. What disposition will the House make of the gentleman's case?

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I ask a vote on my motion that the gentleman from North Carolina, who has rendered to us his excuse, having been so much engaged in looking after the interests of his constituents, be excused.

The motion of Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. SIMMONS, you have also been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I was tempted by my senior colleague from North Carolina—I being a much younger and less experienced man—to attend him for the purpose of backing seed also. [Laughter.] But very shortly after I got to my room, at his suggestion, we both retired and did not back the seed. [Laughter.] The seed are to be backed to-morrow or some other time, when the House is not in session.

Mr. CARUTH. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move to amend by providing that he pay a fine of $1,000.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is it in order to ask a question?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman to say he had been "tempted" by his "senior colleague."

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Was it a four-handed game? [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS. As I lost, it does not make any difference.

The motion of Mr. CARUTH to excuse Mr. SIMMONS was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. PERRY, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. PERRY. I do not know that I have any excuse to make. I throw myself on the mercy of the court.

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. COTHRAN, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. COTHRAN. I left the House quite late, and feeling much fatigued, I went to bed and to sleep.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Quite a sensible fellow. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIBBLE. I move that my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman from Connecticut, who interposed an objection awhile ago to the proposition for which I asked unanimous consent informs me he is now willing to withdraw it.

Mr. VANCE. Yes; I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] moves, by unanimous consent, that the House take a recess until quarter to 12 m. Is there objection?

Mr. DALZELL. I object.

Mr. CANNON. I ask by unanimous consent to occupy two minutes of the time of the House in making some remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. I object, unless the gentleman states his object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] withdraws his objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that the House take a recess until a quarter to 12 o'clock to-morrow. Is there further objection?

Mr. DE LANO. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to granting the gentleman from Illinois two minutes of time for the purpose of making an explanation?

Mr. HOGG. I object.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have not asked a favor of the House for some time. Indeed, it has been some time since I had an opportunity to ask for a favor. I think now we might vary these proceedings if I were permitted to ask, in behalf of my constituents, who need a railroad bridge very badly, to take up for consideration a Senate bill which is an exact copy of the bill, which has already passed the House, with the approval of the Secretary of War and the recommendation of the House committee. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

I thought perhaps it would help, too, to bridge this difficulty.

Mr. HOGG. Understanding the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desires to submit some remarks, I will withdraw my objection and listen to him with pleasure.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the gentleman, but the spirit does not move me now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOGG. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House having in custody, in obedience to the order of the House, Mr. MORSE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MORSE, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MORSE. I was not aware the House was in session.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move the gentleman from Massachusetts be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I think I am authorized, Mr. Speaker, to ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until a quarter to 12 o'clock m. to-day.

Mr. DE LANO. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. FLOOD. I object.

Mr. BURROWS. I move, by unanimous consent, to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, and that the House take a recess until a quarter to 12 o'clock m. to-day.

There was no objection; and all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with, and the House (at 2.27 a. m.) took a recess until 11.45 a. m., Thursday, April 5, 1888.

Hon. S. R. Mallory, of Florida, chairman of the committee on resolutions, presented the following resolution to the convention:

Resolved, As representatives of the convention assembled in New Orleans, February 16, 17, and 18, 1888, recognizing the importance of immediate action of Congress in measures of relief to the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, the mechanic, and the laborer, whereby the surplus product of this country may find a steady market, and skilled and unskilled labor assurance of permanent employment, we believe this will be secured by the extension of foreign commerce, and that the best means to this end is an American merchant marine, fostered and encouraged by the United States Government, which is the unanimous opinion of this body, will be fully subserved by the following bill:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the passage of this act there shall be paid, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to any vessel, whether sail or steam, built and owned wholly in the United States, engaged in the foreign trade, the sum of 30 cents per registered ton for each 1,000 miles sailed, and pro rata for any distance traveled less than 1,000 miles on any voyage or voyages between this and any foreign country or countries, and the measure of distance traveled, and the distance between ports or places in this country and ports or places in foreign countries, and between one foreign port or place and another foreign port or place, and from any designated point of longitude or latitude to any port or place in this country or any foreign country, shall be determined by measurements which shall be furnished by the United States Hydrographic Office to the Bureau of Navigation, and such payments to any vessel as aforesaid shall be paid on the vessel's arrival at a port of entry in the United States, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and promulgate. Official:
[SEAL.]
CHARLES S. HILL,
Secretary of the Convention.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, presented a memorial of 54 citizens of Baltimore County, Maryland, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 2083, for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a memorial of the Agricultural Society of the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 2083, known as the Palmer pleuro-pneumonia bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PAYNE presented 15 petitions, signed by 509 ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Francis Markle and 22 other citizens of Columbiaville, Mich., and the petition of J. C. Rush and 37 other citizens of Lapeer County, Michigan, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON presented two petitions of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Wayne and Luzerne Counties, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of J. C. Loudon and other citizens of Statesville, N. C., praying for the passage of the Blair education bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLAIR. I have here a large mass of many thousands of petitions for the passage of the bill providing pension for army nurses. These petitions are from the Grand Army and from the soldiers of the country, the Woman's Relief Corps, and other like sources; and I will ask, as a bill on that subject has been already reported, that they lie on the table and that the Secretary will take the trouble of making the proper enumeration of these several petitions without delaying the Senate by reading them.

I will, in order to give the contents of this great mass of petitions—they are substantially the same—read one of them. It is as follows:

PETITION FOR ARMY NURSES.

HEADQUARTERS PENSION COMMITTEE, WOMAN'S RELIEF CORPS,
AUXILIARY TO THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
7 Chestnut street, Malden, Mass., September 10, 1887.

The fourth national convention, held in San Francisco, Cal., August, 1886, upon recommendation of the committee on pensions, was instructed to prepare a petition to be circulated by the corps in the various departments for signature by members of the Woman's Relief Corps and Grand Army of the Republic, and friends of the soldiers. The petition is in support of bill prepared by pension committee in behalf of army nurses. It has received the indorsement of the national president, Woman's Relief Corps, and the hearty commendation of Comrades George S. Merrill, James Tanner, John C. Linnehan, and John S. Kountz, of the Grand Army of the Republic national pension committee. (See form of petition on back of this sheet.)

Department presidents will at once place the petition before the corps in their departments; and corps presidents will take prompt action to appoint committees to circulate petitions and obtain signatures of members of the order, comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic, and friends of the soldiers.

It is in support of the bill I have mentioned, which has been reported by the Committee on Pensions.

MRS. HETTIE K. PAINTER.

Mr. PADDOCK. If there is no further morning business, I should like to ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 3839) granting a pension to Mrs. Hettie K. Painter.

Mr. PLUMB. If there is no further morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. PADDOCK. I had already obtained the floor to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill with a view to obtain a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. PLUMB. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the morning business is concluded, I desire to submit some observations to the Senate in pursuance of the notice I gave yesterday.

MRS. HETTIE K. PAINTER.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska rise to morning business?

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to call up a House bill in order to secure the appointment of a conference committee on a disagreement between the two Houses. Substantially the same bill was passed by the Senate. There is an amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions which I should like to have agreed to, and then I will ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the bill is on the Calendar.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3839) granting a pension to Mrs. Hettie K. Painter.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the bill read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Hettie K. Painter, a volunteer nurse during the late war, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the amendment?

Mr. COCKRELL. This amendment raises the question as to whether these nurses shall receive $12 or $25 a month. I had hoped that the Senate committee would acquiesce in the action of the other House in fixing the rate uniformly at $12 a month, which is what widows receive. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from Missouri will recollect that when substantially the same bill was under consideration it was stated that this was an exceptional case, a case of special merit, and the Senate agreed to the report of the committee in fixing that sum. The only aim now is to secure a committee of conference, and bring about an agreement between the two Houses as to the rate to be fixed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 17; not a quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. Not being advised how he would vote, I refrain from voting. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who is absent under the orders of the Senate. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and without thinking of it at the moment I voted in the negative.

I withdraw my vote, supposing that the Senator from Vermont would vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to state that I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE. My colleague [Mr. HALE] is absent under the orders of the Senate, and is paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BROWN. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 17; as follows:

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was orded to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. TURPIE were appointed.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1204.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had previously recognized the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], who gave notice of his intention to make some observations on the resolution to refer the message of the President.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In pursuance of the notice which I gave yesterday, I now move to take from the table the resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to refer the President's message to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN December 19, 1887, as follows:

Resolved, That the President's annual message be referred to the Committee on Finance.

FORFEITURE OF UNEARNED RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. Before the Senator from Iowa commences his speech I wish to state that to-morrow morning, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill which I brought to the attention of the Senate a few moments ago, being the bill (S. 1430) to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes.

COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me, so that I may call up Senate bill 1204, which is purely a local bill of only about five lines and can be passed, I am confident, within two minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will yield if it is not going to occupy time.

Mr. FAULKNER. If it leads to any debate I shall withdraw the matter from the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa yields for the purpose of permitting the Senator from West Virginia to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1204) to provide for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States at Martinsburgh, in the district of West Virginia. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 3, after the word "circuit," to strike out "court" and insert "and district courts;" in line 5, after the word "of," to insert "each of," and in line 6, after the word "said," to strike out "court" and insert "courts;" so as to read:

That, in addition to the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States, now held in the district of West Virginia, there shall be held, in each year, one term of each of said courts, at Martinsburgh, in said district, on the first Tuesday in August.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of West Virginia shall, in addition to the terms of said court now held in said district, hold one term of said court annually at Martinsburgh, in said district, on the 20th day of March.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 6879) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to convey to Anson Rudd, of the State of Colorado, certain real estate in the county of Fremont, in said State; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HELENA.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he will yield to me to call up a local bill which I have been making an effort for some ten days to get up, and which I am especially interested in having passed? If it leads to any debate or any delay I shall withdraw it at once. I would not make the request but that I spoke to the Senator from Iowa about it this morning. Other matters have intervened up to this time, and if he will yield for that purpose I should be glad to call up that bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. With the understanding stated by him, I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4472) for a public building at Helena, Ark.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE CLAIM.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the regular order now.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the Senator from Iowa to give way to me for a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do not do that. It is not fair to the Senator from Iowa nor fair to the other cases on the Calendar.

Mr. CAMERON. That is for the Senator from Iowa to say, I think.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it is not fair to the other cases on the Calendar. I demand the regular order.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to state, not to the Senator from Vermont particularly, but to the Senate, that the bill I propose to have taken up was passed over on Saturday last, when I was absent with the Committee on Commerce in New York, by the order of the Senate, and it is only fair that it should be considered now. I ask for a vote of the Senate, if the Senator from Iowa will give way to me for a moment, so as to test the feeling of the Senate on the question of taking it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa, who is entitled to the floor, yield for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Pennsylvania to make the motion?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should have no objection to yielding to the Senator from Pennsylvania, provided the bill he wishes to get up is not going to occupy much time.

Mr. CAMERON. If there is any debate upon it I will withdraw it, but I should like to have a vote of the Senate on taking it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects, and, therefore, unanimous consent can not be given, and the question will have to be decided by the vote of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. I understand that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Iowa chooses to give way, on the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I do not make any objection.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2329) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to re-examine and reaudit the claim of the State of Pennsylvania for advances made and money borrowed by said State to pay the militia called into the military service by the governor under the proclamation of the President of June 15, 1863.

The bill was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any report, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a report.

Mr. CAMERON. There is a report, but I think I can explain the bill in less time than the reading of the report would occupy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read. The bill involves the whole question of interest to all the States, millions and millions of dollars.

Mr. CAMERON. It is not anything of the kind. This was interest paid by the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk began to read the report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, March 13, 1888.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That seems to be a report of considerable length, and while I regret to withdraw the consent given to the Senator from Pennsylvania——

Mr. CAMERON. I do not want to interfere with the Senator.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then I shall resume the floor, Mr. President.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN December 19, 1887, to refer the President's annual message to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, estimated the revenues for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, at $383,000,000. His estimate of expenditures for the same period was $326,530,793.26. From these figures resulted his estimate for the same period of a surplus of $56,469,206.74. These are suggestive facts, and they definitely notify us that the Government under existing laws is collecting more money than is required to meet its expenditures.

In the same report it is stated that the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, were $371,403,277.66, and that the expenditures for the year were $315,835,428.12, leaving a surplus of receipts over expenditures of $55,567,849.54; that the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, actual and estimated, are $383,000,000, and the expenditures for the year $316,817,785.48, showing a surplus of $66,182,214.52. From these data it appears that the aggregate surplus for the three years amounts to $178,219,270.80, or an average per year of $59,406,423.60.

The result thus disclosed presents the limit within which Congress may move in the matter of effecting a reduction of the revenue. However much we may differ in respect of the methods of reduction, we doubtless will all agree that the annual revenue of the Government should be reduced. It is not wise nor just to collect more revenue than is needed for the proper purposes of the Government. We are doing this unwise and unjust thing. This ought not to continue. How can it be stopped? By amending the revenue laws. As a general proposition this answer is quite correct; but its indefiniteness leaves us in as great perplexity as though it had not been given. It is quite easy to say that a reduction of taxation will diminish the Government's revenue; but when we come to consider of how it shall be done we are at once confronted by such a multitude of possible results that we are forced to contemplate almost the entire office and scope of government. When we enter upon this duty we find on every hand warnings suggestive of great care in our movements and conservatism in our methods, and unless these warnings are heeded the results of inconsiderate action may be more harmful to the public interests than those which come from a surplus of revenue.

It is not often that nations are confronted by the exigency which now commands our attention. Surplus revenues do not frequently distress them. Deficiencies are usually the troublesome factors of their revenue systems. The principal worry of their statesmen is the devising of measures to enlarge their revenues. In this work they often become adepts. They become skilled in methods for the imposition of additional taxes. The application of this skill has been the constant attendant of the march of the nations, and the aggregates of debt and taxation have increased with the years of their progress. The debts of the nations whose statistics in this regard are at public command now aggregate, in round numbers, $30,000,000,000, or, assuming the present population of the earth to be 1,500,000,000, some $20 for each man, woman, and child now living. Assuming that an average of five persons constitute the family the world over, we have $100 of the public debts resting upon each household. But our statistics are at fault in some respects. There are some national debts of which we have no accurate statements; and there are many millions of the world's inhabitants not included in the populations of nations having public debts. If we carry these two factors into the case it may safely be said that an approximately accurate distribution of the national debts to heads of families would assign to each about $150.

How is this burden of debt carried? By the imposition of taxes. Does this lighten it? To do this taxes should grow less as the years go on. Are the peoples of the earth experiencing this result? Far from it. Take the decade reaching from 1870 to 1880 as an illustration of how far otherwise the fact is. During the period named taxation in Great Britain increased 20.17 per cent.; in France, 36.13 per cent.; in Russia, 37.10 per cent.; in Sweden and Norway, 50.10 per cent.; in Germany, 57.81 per cent.; and taking into account the other governments, great and small, of Europe, we arrive at for all an average of 28.01 per cent. It would be useless to look to those countries for examples of legislative wisdom in the matter of devising ways and means for the reduction of the surplus which we find existing in the annual revenues of the United States. We must examine our own case and treat it as best we can, for we stand as an exception in the line of nations. In other countries debts are, almost without exception, increasing. The opposite condition exists in this country. In 1866 the public debt of the United States was $2,678,126,103.87. On the 1st of January, 1888, it was, less cash in the Treasury, $1,225,598,401.99, showing a reduction of $1,452,527,701 in the comparatively short period of twenty-two years. In other countries the percentage of taxation is increasing. As I have already shown, the average percentage of increase in European countries from 1870 to 1880 was 28.01. How was it in the United States for the same period? Why, taxation in this country decreased 9.15 per cent. Thus we find the financial condition of the United States most satisfactorily exceptional when compared with that of other nations. Our national debt is rapidly disappearing; our rate of taxation is diminishing; our revenue largely exceeds our expenditures; we have an annual surplus. This is our case. What are we to do with it?

Mr. President, before I venture any suggestions in response to this question I will indulge in a little retrospection. The most notable movements of this nation had their commencement in March, 1861, when the Republican party assumed control of its affairs. It is not my purpose at this time to enter into a statement of the details of the wondrous chapters in the history of this Republic in which are preserved the events which commenced with and succeeded the 4th day of March, 1861. It is only with results that I will now deal, and I will select these mainly from the financial field covered by those chapters in our history. Therein I will find all that my present purpose shall have use for. No like numbers of years in the history of any nation are so crowded with serviceable lessons for study by political economists as are those which commenced on the 4th day of March, 1861, and followed on down to the present time. No candid mind can review the events of those years without coming to the conclusion that the political party which entered upon the administration of the affairs of this country on that memorable day was one of dauntless courage and unbounded capacity. It was the Republican party that took upon itself the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of this Republic on that crucial day, and its subsequent course of action demonstrated that it possessed both of the essential qualities I have mentioned. Neither time nor changes of conditions nor partisan criticisms can disturb the fact I have stated. It is too firmly embedded in the history, the affairs, the success, the prosperity, the masterful position, the satisfactory results possessed by our people ever to be eliminated or seriously affected.

Had the Republican party been deficient in either courage or capacity it would have broken down in the first year of its administration of our national affairs. But it did not break down. It took up its great work, carried it on, and effected success as no other party in the history of nations had ever done. Supreme courage and boundless legislative and executive capacity were requisite to the work imposed on it by the startling and exceptional circumstances and exigencies which confronted it. The Government was without money and without credit. Both were essential not only to success, but also to continued existence. Both were created in volume so vast, that the consuming demands of one of the mightiest wars that ever preyed on a nation's endurance could not exhaust them. The total aggregate receipts of the Government, excluding loans, for the year 1861 was but $41,476,299. The net ordinary expenditures, including interest, was $66,650,213. The war was on, the Republican party was in power, and the first year of its legislation and administration gave evidence of its capacity to meet any emergency; for while the total ordinary receipts, excluding loans, for 1862 was only $51,919,261, the total net ordinary expenditures, including interest, was $469,570,241. Three years thereafter the net ordinary receipts, excluding loans, increased to $322,031,158, and the total ordinary expenditures, including interest, reached the vast sum of $1,295,099,289. In the matter of the public debt the figures for the years referred to are most instructive. In 1861 it amounted to $90,580,873.72. In 1865 it had risen to the vast sum of $2,680,647,869.74, and one year thereafter (1866) it reached the highest point, and was $2,773,236,173.69. From that time to the present it has steadily diminished. Step by step, year by year, the process of reduction has gone on, until now it is but $1,225,598,401.99.

What lesson do these facts present? What do they teach us? Why, that the Republican party had that practical capacity that could evolve a boundless credit for a Government that was bankrupt in both money and credit when it took charge of its affairs. We need but to consult the quotations representing the prices of the obligations of the United States in the public markets for the years 1860 and 1888 to learn how low the credit had gone in the first year and how high it ranks in the present. Then it was at a discount of about 12 per cent. for obligations bearing 6 per cent. interest, now it commands 26 per cent. premium for bonds bearing but 4 per cent. interest, and this result comes from no change in our financial system effected by the political party now in possession of the executive department of the Government and of that legislative body which, under our Constitution, alone can originate revenue bills.

Mr. President, the world's history in respect of political administration supplies no fitting companion-piece for the case which the courage and capacity of the Republican party wrought out during the twenty-four years in which it administered the affairs of this nation. No age, or time, or nation, or party, can match it. It stands alone in its strength and beauty. It is unique as a political creation in every respect. How it could have been created is a wonder which grows all the more perplexing to minds not trained in the school of political science which teaches that the mere carrying of elections and the winning of partisan successes are not the chief ends of government. Indeed, it perplexes many sturdy minds of honest purpose when they undertake to study the result by resorting to an examination of the details of the marvelous facts and events that are incased in those eventful years from 1861 to 1865, both included. The waste of war, the interruption of the ordinary occupations of men, the drain of money, the strain of credit, the want of development of national industries, the absence of a remunerative foreign commerce, the need of a sound financial system, were all present factors in the first of those years, and some of them continued through the entire series. These were not signs of promise. Rather were they portents of disaster and failure. But they did not daunt the courage nor dissipate the capacity of the Republican party. It took up its burden, looked its task in the face, and resolutely went its way to victory.

A few illustrations may not be out of place just here. What was the condition of our foreign trade as represented by the imports and exports of merchandise in 1860, the year preceding the accession of the Republican party to the control of our national affairs? Why, our imports were $353,616,119; our exports were $333,576,057, showing in this respect a balance of trade against us of $20,040,062. Now take the corresponding items in our foreign trade for the year 1884, which closed the term of Republican administration of our national affairs, and we will find a marked contrast in the result. Our corresponding exports for the year 1884 amounted to $740,513,609; the imports were $667,697,693. This shows a balance of foreign trade, in the respect named, in favor of the United States of $72,815,916.

The total valuation of real and personal property in the United States in 1860 was $16,159,616,068. In 1880 (the census year nearest the close of the Republican term) it was $43,642,000,000, showing an increase during the twenty intervening years of $27,482,383,932.

In 1860 the receipts of the Government were $56,054,000, and its expenditures were $63,200,875, and it was compelled to borrow, at the high rate of discount I have already stated, $7,146,875 to meet its expenses for the year. In 1884 the receipts were $384,519,870, and its expenditures were $244,126,244, thus having a surplus of $140,393,626, which it applied to the reduction of the funded debt, instead of being forced to increase the debt, as was the Democratic administration of 1860.

When the Democrats went out of power in 1861 they left the country in a most deplorable condition in respect of its money circulation. When it assumed power again in 1884 it found that the Republicans, during their twenty-four years of administration, had given to the country the best and most stable system of currency possessed by any nation on the earth.

Such illustrations as these might be multiplied almost without limit. They may be found in every department of our public affairs. They are found in every section of that broad field bounded by that expressive term, the general welfare. Select whatever subject we please, and we find apt and forceful illustrations. If we select that of internal improvements, of commerce, both foreign and domestic, of manufactures, the homes of the people, of education, of invention, of general progress, including the arts and sciences, we find that each and all of them have made wondrous advances and substantial improvements during all of the years which succeeded the inauguration of the first Republican national administration in 1861.

How have these things come to pass? Surely not by the operation of bad laws and unsound public policies. Such instrumentalities do not induce results like these. Practically all of the laws and public policies under and by force of which the superb conditions of this country have been evolved found their places in the statute-books of this nation since the year 1860. Indeed, about the only mistakes of serious consequences that the Republican party made during its twenty-four years of national administration resulted from its too close following in one or two respects of Democratic examples and practices originated prior to 1861. The most striking example of want of due caution in this regard is to be found in the action of the Republican party in following the lead of the Democratic party in making land grants to aid in the construction of railroads. When the Republicans came into power in 1861 they were asked to make grants of public lands for the purpose indicated. Both political parties had taken positions in their national platforms of 1860 in favor of the construction of a line of railroad to the Pacific Ocean. The people of the Western States and Territories were earnest in their demands for aid to be given, not only for the construction of that road, but of many others in their several sections. Memorials came to Congress from State and Territorial Legislatures praying for the granting of such aid. They were supplemented by thousands of petitions from the people. An examination of the precedents disclosed the fact that during Democratic and Whig administrations prior to 1861 forty-four different land grants, for the purpose named, had been enacted by Congress, embracing an aggregate of some 30,000,000 acres of land. Four of the acts making these grants had been approved by Whig Presidents and forty by Democratic occupants of the Presidential office. The example thus set was followed by the Republicans. The greater number of these acts were passed during the period covered by the war of the rebellion.

It would have been well had all of the Congresses engaged in the enactment of land-grant laws given more thought to the possibilities embraced within the policy which they established. Had this been done the country might have enjoyed the benefits which have resulted from the policy, and, at the same time, avoided the evils which all admit came from it. But the country was so wholly devoted to the one purpose of forcing development, by means of pushing railroad construction where both population and business were practically absent, that little care was taken to divine and study the conditions that would be induced when the one dominating object of the times should be realized. Upon this suggestive field of discussion it is not my purpose to enter now. For years we have been trying to remedy evils which might have been avoided had the Democratic party been more thoughtful and conservative when it established the policy of granting public lands to aid in the construction of railroads. This Democratic policy was in forceful activity when the Republican party entered upon the control of our national affairs in 1861. The condition of the country at that time will in large degree serve to excuse the mistake of the Republicans in following too closely the course pursued by the Democrats in the many preceding years in establishing and pushing the policy of making land grants to effect the construction of railroads. The capacity, the thought, the energy, the patriotism of the Republican party were devoted to a work which might well excuse it for not at once detecting the dangerous possibilities embraced in the Democratic land-grant policy.

The Republican party was not responsible for the war of the rebellion; but it was responsible for the maintenance of our institutions, the enforcement of our laws, and the unity of the Republic to the fullest extent of the intent expressed in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States. This responsibility it met and discharged. But in doing this it had to formulate and enforce policies in many respects untried in this country, and in other instances to the extremest tension of the powers of government. Vast armies were necessary to meet the exigencies present in the condition of the nation. Money and credit without limit had to be provided. In every respect the exacting demands of the times were met in manner and extent equal to the extremest requirements of the situation. But the actions of the Republican party were profoundly considered and wisely projected. They embraced more than the mere question of money supplies; they covered the considerations of the sources of supply and the means necessary for their augmentation. How to provide the supplies and at the same time promote prosperity of people and country was a problem presenting many difficulties to the operations of the processes of its solution. But it was solved; and the result was that the exactions of a great war and the consequent burdens went through the years hand in hand with surprising and exceptional general prosperity.

This statement, when tested by the experiences and beliefs of other nations, seems a paradox; but while they may say it is inconsistent and absurd, it is nevertheless true in fact. This is easily proved by the statistics supplied by the census reports of this country. Take as one of the elements of this test the aggregate value of manufactures produced in the United States in the years of the last three censuses of this nation, and see how fully the figures presented support the declaration I have made. In 1860 the aggregate values of manufactures produced in that year was $1,885,861,676; in 1870 the value was $4,232,325,442; in 1880 the value was $5,369,579,191. Was it the war of the rebellion and its attendant burdens that caused the increase in the value of manufactures of this country in 1860 to show an absolute increase in the twenty succeeding years, which brings us to 1880, of $3,483,517,515? These figures show an average annual increase of $174,175,875. Is this fact the result of depression and disaster? If so, let us cultivate these too-generally deplored factors in human affairs.

Mr. President, if we now place alongside of these figures, those which I have given in other parts of my remarks, do we not have before us a picture of national prosperity and progress that must have been the production of just laws and wise public policies. How else are we to account for our superb progression? Such things do not come by chance. Nations do not blunder into them. Such visitors do not present themselves without invitation. No such things ever transpired under the Democratic administrations prior to 1860. Why should they have at once asserted themselves on the retirement of those administrations? Why did not the war prevent them? Why did not burdensome taxation suppress them? Why did not the nation become poor and poverty-stricken instead of outstripping all other countries in the accumulation of wealth and in the surpassing improvement of its habitation? If we did not realize what was going on in these respects the people of other countries did. This is evidenced by the fact that immigration into the United States, exclusive of that from China, from 1860 to 1880 amounted to 5,095,078. Why was this? Was it because we were not prosperous? Was it because the wages of men who work were lower in this country than in those from which they came? Was it because the cost of living in this country, taking into consideration its character and the wages paid, was more expensive than that which they experienced in their fatherlands? Was it because it was more difficult for men to obtain homes for themselves and their families in this land than those from which they came? Was it because the individual had less chance to make his own way to forceful membership of society here than elsewhere? No, Mr. President, not for these reasons did these millions come unto us. They came for reasons just the opposite of these. They may not have known why these things were, but they saw them from their far-off fatherlands, and came here to possess them.

But, Mr. President, notwithstanding the universally admitted facts which I have presented, it is insisted by those who are opposed to the public policy which has induced them that the general statement of our national case is misleading. It is urged that many exceptions exist in it which greatly detract from its force and beauties; that while some industries have prospered others have been depressed; that while the many bear the burdens and pay the taxes the few reap the benefits; that the agricultural industry, which leads all others in the grand aggregate of usefulness and value, has been oppressed that others might prosper. If this be true, as stated, then we can not too speedily discover the cause and apply an adequate remedy. But is the statement true? Do not the great industries of this country go hand and hand whatever conditions attend them? Let us take ten of the leading agricultural States and test the case by the figures which are found in the census of 1860 and that of 1880. In order to do this I quote the following table from an address recently issued to the farmers of the United States, namely:

	Increase 303 per cent.		Increase 389 per cent.

The growth of manufactures in the ten States here named surely has wrought no hardship for imposition on agriculture. The increase of 303 per cent. in wages paid to the workers in the manufacturing establishments indicates how greatly the home markets for the food products of the farmer have increased, the 389 per cent. of increase of value in materials used shows how much more of the wools, the flax, the hemp, the straw, the woods are consumed in the localities of production, and the increase of 160 per cent. in the acreage of improved land proves how the two great industries go hand in hand and prosper together. It can result in no good to our progress to keep them apart or to hinder the sturdy growth of both in any part of the country. Let the two prosper in every State. The true policy is the one that will plant manufacturing establishments in every part of each agricultural State in the Union. If a reduction of prices at which manufactured articles may be bought is what we want, there is no surer road to its realization than the one which will lead to the distribution of manufacturing plants into all of the localities where agriculture produces cheap food and joins with the forests, the mines, and the quarries in supplying the raw materials needed. Our true interests must ever antagonize dependence for our manufactured goods of whatsoever kind on the centralized industries of foreign countries or of our own. Let us have an end of the policy which tends to centralize our manufacturing plants in the great cities, and establish in its stead one that will effect a distribution of them to all parts of our country. Our protective policy has, in spite of the obstacles it has encountered, most suggestive results in this regard, and these results have not all been absorbed by the manufacturing industries. Agriculture has gathered a part of the harvest to itself.

In the ten States embraced in the foregoing table one effect is made apparent by the statistics of the census of 1880, which should be studied by all, and especially by those engaged in agriculture. In all of those States there are counties in which manufacturing industries have been established, and others in which this result had not been realized. Taking the ten States together the average value per acre of land in the counties in which manufactures had been planted was $35.86. In the other counties the average value per acre was $22.41. This shows an average value per acre in favor of the counties in which manufacturing industries were present of $13.45. In a large majority of the counties embraced in the ten States named manufacturing industries did not exist. This suggests that the proper thing to do in the matter of promoting the interests of agriculture is to multiply manufacturing plants, and to induce a distribution of them amongst localities where they are not now present. This can not be done by applying the methods recommended by the President in his message. If we follow his suggestions and give effect to them we will not multiply manufacturing plants and distribute them to regions where they do not now exist. On the contrary, we will embarrass those now in operation and repress the tendency to invest capital in others.

Instead of emasculating our protective system, let our transportation regulations be invigorated by a thorough and yet considerate infusion of the elements of justice and equal rights for all localities and interests. This is what the true interests of the country needs rather than tariff tinkering. The people have understood this for a long time, and it was this that led them to make that resolute insistance which finally eventuated in the enactment of the present law for the regulation of interstate commerce. Imperfect as that law is, it has accomplished no little good, but its full office will not be discharged until it shall have been so amended that it can carry the doctrine, practice, and effect of assured equal rights to all sections and localities on which it can operate in the matter of the business and commerce in which they may be severally interested. Let this be done and the union of interests between agriculture and manufactures will need no strengthening through the medium of assaults on our revenue laws because of the protection they assure to the industries of this country.

But, Mr. President, however much we may discuss the questions to which I have given little more than passing notice, the well-defined fact will remain that we have an average annual surplus revenue of about $60,000,000. It is quite generally conceded that we should revise our revenue laws in order to avoid this surplus. This brings us to a consideration of methods. Here we enter upon a field in which opinions confront each other in sharp conflict. The general concession that something must be done has not evolved harmony in respect of the methods through which the end shall be reached. Almost as many different schemes have been proposed as there are interests to be affected. Many of these are closely allied to the principle of selfishness, so often dominant in the affairs of men. "Do what you please, so that you do not harm me," seems to be stamped on most of the packages of methods presented for the reduction of the revenue.

This indicates a narrow view of a great subject, and yet, in a certain sense, it is a proper one, for in the formulation of all public policies each distinct and proper interest should receive due and considerate attention. It is the general welfare that is involved, and this suggests that caution be observed in all efforts for its promotion. From failures to practice this rule in the enactment of laws come those inequalities which breed the frictions and discontents that so often injuriously affect the better conditions of society and government. Can we so closely follow the rule suggested as to avoid the results indicated and at the same time reduce our revenue to the extent of $60,000,000 a year? No other laws on our statute-books affect so many different interests of our people as do the revenue laws; hence changes therein should be made with a caution which will assure us a just comprehension of the results that will follow our action. What can be done in this regard that will be productive of the least harm? The right thing to be done will be that which a correct answer to this question shall present. Can it be found in any of the various schemes that have been urged upon our attention by the President and other opponents of our system of protection? Is there anything in their schemes that could produce such happy results as, in the short period of seven years, appeared in the cotton manufacturing industry of the Southern States under and because of our present system of protection? What these results are is very clearly shown by the following extract from an article recently published in the National Review, namely:

That the South is making rapid and commendable progress in the extension of this branch of her industries will be shown by the following figures. In 1880 there were in the Atlantic and Gulf Southern States mills distributed as follows:

States.	Mills.	Spindles.	Looms.	Average number spindles per mill.
	No.	Number.	No.
Maryland	22	130,100	1,649	5,913
Virginia	10	52,134	1,511	5,213
North Carolina	51	98,382	1,701	1,929
South Carolina	20	94,326	1,955	4,716
Georgia	52	209,229	4,389	4,023
Alabama	19	56,390	813	2,967
Mississippi	8	22,028	616	2,753
Texas	2	6,269	128	3,130
Louisiana	5	9,374	113	1,871
Total	189	678,223	12,875	3,588

It will be seen there were in 1880 189 mills with a total capacity of 678,223 spindles, being about 7 per cent. only of all the spindles in the United States.

At the beginning of 1888, a period of seven years, these same States showed the following increase:

States.	Mills.	Spindles.	Looms.	Average number spindles per mill.
	No.	Number.	No.
Maryland	20	175,550	2,963	8,777
Virginia	13	69,649	2,314	5,357
North Carolina	91	250,854	5,929	2,756
South Carolina	34	248,136	5,734	7,298
Georgia	58	390,440	9,007	6,731
Alabama	20	114,540	2,324	5,727
Mississippi	10	52,844	1,296	5,284
Louisiana	5	38,968	1,044	7,793
Texas	3	5,494	124	1,831
Total	254	1,346,475	30,735	5,301

In seven years the number of spindles in the nine States named has increased nearly 100 per cent.

This is good for the Southern States. It induces the investment of capital; it gives employment to their people; it increases the value of their farms and plantations. These results tend to the improvement of moral and political conditions. Nor have these things obstructed our presence in the foreign trade in manufactured cotton goods. In 1886 we exported 193,841,353 yards of cotton goods, and in 1887 204,601,487 yards. Of the amount exported in 1886, 12,046,746 yards went to Great Britain. Nor have we been kept out of the foreign markets with our manufactures from these cotton goods. During the time mentioned we exported $435,536 worth of cotton wearing-apparel and $1,144,137 worth of other cotton goods manufactured from our cotton cloths, a considerable percentage of which went to England, in successful competition with like goods produced by her cheap labor. And we all know that our own people never purchased cotton goods at lower average prices than now obtain. Like instances of increased production, reduction of prices, and exportation under our protective policy in many other fields of manufacture might be cited. It needs no argument to prove that no such results as these could have come to us had we been practicing the policy which the President in his message recommends to us. We have done well and are now doing well under the policy which he assails. Whatever of danger may now be confronting the business conditions of this country come from sources other than those embraced in our protective policy. That has given to us strength and prosperity. It has developed our resources; it has given employment to our people. These could not have come from free trade.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said about the repeal of the duties on sugar and molasses. These are articles used by all classes of our people. They properly take their position amongst the necessaries of life. From them the Government collected import duties in the fiscal year 1886–1887 to the amount of $58,004,358. They belong to that class of imports on which the consumers pay the entire duty. Why? Simply because the demand for consumption in this country so far exceeds the amount of domestic production that the element of competition between the domestic and foreign producers is wholly eliminated from the case. When this occurs the amount of duty paid follows the article into the possession of the consumer and becomes a part of its cost to him. During the year mentioned we imported 2,377,289,920 pounds of sugar and 36,477,626 gallons of molasses; and the domestic production was, of sugar 299,553,920 pounds, of molasses 21,508,732 gallons. These figures present an aggregate result in which the element of domestic production is quite insignificant, and the effect of the protective policy in respect of the development of the home manufacturer is almost unappreciable. Hence, to the superficial observer, this is an inviting field upon which to enter in our explorations for subjects from which to remove duties in order to dispense with our annual surplus revenue. We want to reduce our annual receipts from revenue about $60,000,000. We collect over $58,000,000 per year from sugar and molasses. This vast sum is added to the cost of these articles to the consumers. This, as I have already stated, results from the fact that the domestic production falls so far short of the demand for home consumption that the element of competition has disappeared from the case.

If we stop our investigation at this point we must conclude that the duty imposed on sugar is a burden to consumers void of justification or defense. But it is not well to stop an investigation of any subject until we can feel a reasonable assurance that it has been exhausted and that no further material facts may be ascertained. The correctness of this rule has a pertinent and forceful illustration in the sugar subject; for if we take the market prices of raw sugar in New York during the sixty-one years running from 1825 to 1886, the average lowest price appears to have been 7¼ cents per pound and the average highest price 10½ cents. For the year 1886 the lowest price was 4⅝ cents per pound and the highest 5½ cents. From this it appears that, notwithstanding the consumers have been paying the duty on the sugar used by them, the price of the article has become lower in spite of the tariff. This result, of course, has not come from the fact that the import duty was imposed, but because of the increased production and the changes that have transpired in the general conditions of the industry. But even these facts do not avoid the truth of the statement that the consumers of sugar in this country, in effect, pay the duty levied on it, for the reason, before stated, that the domestic production is not equal to the demand for home consumption; but it does avoid the complaint so often and thoughtlessly made that the duty has increased the market price of sugar.

What immediate effect the repeal of the duty would have on the price of sugar is immaterial for the purposes of my present discussion. For the purposes of the discussion, I may admit that the repeal of the duty would reduce the price to consumers to the full extent of the revenue now derived from it. Then why not by the simple process of repealing the duties on sugar and molasses effect that reduction of our annual revenue which seems to be the financial reform so generally demanded? By this simple and single act our annual surplus of about $60,000,000 would be reduced to about $2,000,000, and it could not require great effort to find the means for dispensing with this insignificant remainder. The case looks simple enough as we now have it before us. Why not put an end to our financial tribulations by at once wiping out the $58,000,000 of yearly collections from sugar and molasses? The President of the United States, in his last annual message to Congress, told us that—

> Our progress towards a wise conclusion will not be improved by dwelling u p theories of protection and free trade. This savors too much of bandying epithets. It is a condition which confronts us, not a theory.

Most true, and what is the condition? We are collecting about $60,000,000 more revenue each year than the expenditures of the Government require. How are we to rid ourselves of this condition? Of course by reducing the aggregate of taxation; and the President gave us a suggestion in his message of the proper line of policy to be pursued in effecting this reduction. He said:

> The taxation of luxuries presents no features of hardship; but the necessaries of life used and consumed by all the people, the duty upon which adds to the cost of living in every home, should be greatly cheapened.

Must he not have had sugar and molasses in mind when he placed that passage in his message? No articles are of more universal use and none are more generally placed in the list of necessaries. They are found in every home and are consumed by all of the people. Why not place them on the free-list? Let us not in giving answer to this question forget that the President informed us in his message that—

> Both of the great political parties now represented in the Government have, by repeated and authoritative declarations, condemned the condition of our laws which permit the collection from the people of unnecessary revenue, and have, in most solemn manner, promised its correction, and neither as citizens or partisans are our countrymen in a mood to condone the deliberate violation of these pledges.

This is well stated and all true. Can we give better response to this admonition than by placing sugar and molasses on the free-list? Answering for myself, I must say that I believe we can do better. I am content to aid in such reformation of our revenue laws as shall ultimate in these necessary articles getting into the free-list, but am not willing to place them there at once and unconditionally. This is a subject in respect of which we can safely make haste slowly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOLPH in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that the unfinished business will be laid aside informally, in order that my colleague may proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside until the other Senator from Iowa concludes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, during the last eight years the United States has furnished a market to the producers of foreign sugars and molasses in the aggregate amount of $746,268,983, being an annual average of $93,283,622. If our commercial conditions remain substantially as they now are this annual average will increase. But we do not, and quite certainly will not, need the revenue which these great importations will furnish. Can we dispense with the revenue and at the same time reap a substantial commercial advantage? It seems to me that we can, with a reasonable degree of rapidity that will give us a completed result in a short term of years. The President in his message reminded us that—

> We are in the midst of centennial celebrations, and with becoming pride we rejoice in American skill and ingenuity, in American energy and enterprise, and in the wonderful natural advantages and resources developed by a century's national growth.

Very true, and quite American, is this expression in respect of our centennial junctures. And now suppose we turn a little of this American skill, ingenuity, energy, and enterprise into the field I am discussing, and see what will come of the experiment? May not American legislative and executive skill, acting in conjunction, devise methods by aid of which American ingenuity, energy, and enterprise may open new commercial ways and markets, which shall bring most welcome returns to even the agricultural industry of our country about which the President said so much in his message and seems to know so little? This sugar question presents to us and to the executive department a splendid field for experimental commercial operations. It embraces a great volume of commercial capital. Can we make it of practical value? It seems to me that we can.

If Congress should enact a law declaring that sugar and molasses may be imported into the United States, free of duty, from all countries producing them, provided that such countries would refrain from imposing export duties thereon and agree to admit the products of this country into their ports duty free, would we not be quite sure to realize substantial benefit therefrom? Of course this could not all be effected at once. It would involve negotiations and treaty regulations between this country and those that might enter into the arrangements with us. While this is going on what shall be done with the revenue derived from the articles involved in the plan? We do not need the money. We can dispense with it all, and still have more than enough to meet our annual expenditures. Then let us adopt the practical business plan that has worked so well in European countries. Let us provide for paying a reasonable bounty for the production of sugar in the United States. The per capita consumption of sugar is steadily increasing in this country. In 1876 the consumption of sugar in the United States was 37.1 pounds for each person in our population. In 1885 this rate had increased to 51.4 pounds, and is still increasing.

In 1864 we produced 56 per cent. of all the sugar consumed in this country. In twenty years our production supplied only 9¾ per cent. of the total consumption, as this is the rate disclosed by the statistics of 1884. Why shall we not reverse this movement and begin a progress towards that other and better result which will give us sugar of domestic production in quantity equal to the demand for home consumption? Can we not safely enter upon an enterprise that is no longer experimental? May we not repeat what other countries have done, and expect to reap at least as favorable results as they have gathered? Let us study the results that have been induced in Europe in the manufacture of beet sugar and resolve them to our profit. In the sugar season of 1872 the total production was 873,000 tons. In 1884 this was increased to 2,305,000 tons. It is not many years since Germany did not produce sugar in quantity equal to the demand for home consumption, while now she manufactures over 1,000,000 tons, and of this 600,000 tons are exported. This is the work of the bounty system, and the agricultural industries of the European countries involved have been greatly promoted. I know that the term "bounty" is not one for which our people have an ardent love; but its practical usefulness in such a case as I am now treating will modify the prejudice that has so closely attended it.

The result is what we want. Place before that American skill and ingenuity, so warmly eulogized by the President in his message, the inducement which Germany offered to her agriculturists, and it will not be long before the farmers and planters of the United States, aided by the experiments of the Government, and by applying their energy and enterprise to the field of production which has proved so profitable in other countries, would assure to us even better results than those that have been realized abroad.

The Department of Agriculture has recently issued a bulletin in respect of the experiments made under the direction of the Commissioner during the year 1887, in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum and sugar canes, which presents a most encouraging view of the subject. The bulletin contains most interesting accounts of the progress that has been made in this experimental field. Magnus Swenson, who had charge of the experiments in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum at Fort Scott, Kans., concludes his report to the Commissioner as follows, namely:

In reviewing the work the most important point suggested is the complete success of the experiments in demonstrating the commercial practicability of manufacturing sugar from sorghum-cane.

2. That sugar was produced uniformly throughout the entire season.

3. That this was not due to any extraordinary content of sugar in the cane, but, on the contrary, the cane was much injured by severe drought and chinchbugs.

4. That the value of the sugar and molasses obtained this year per ton of sorghum-cane will compare favorably with the highest yields obtained in Louisiana from sugar-cane, and, taking into consideration the much greater cost of the sugar-cane, and that it has no equivalent to the 2 bushels of seed yielded per ton of sorghum-cane, also our much cheaper fuel, I say without hesitancy that sugar can be produced fully as cheaply in Kansas as in Louisiana.

The bulletin presents the report of E. B. Cowgill, who was appointed by the State board of agriculture of Kansas to make inspection of the manufacture of sugar in that State for the year 1887. His report is most thorough and interesting. It discusses every phase of the subject, and insists that sorghum is a more valuable crop for the Kansas farmer to cultivate than either of the leading cereals, and follows an exemplification in detail of this claim with the following general statement, namely:

Thus it will be seen that the sorghum yields to the farmer more than twice as much per acre as either of the leading cereals, and as a gross product of agriculture and manufacture on our own soil more than six times as much per acre as is usually realized from either of these standard crops.

And the report concludes in these words, namely:

Processes whereby sugar can be made at a profit from sorghum have been worked out. These are far from perfect, but present developments give promise of others in the near future, and will enable us to produce our own sugar on our soil with the labor of our people. Those who invest in the new industry will be cautious about experimenting with unknown conditions. Kansas is, therefore, likely to lead in the development and become the first Northern sugar State.

This is a good showing for the experimental stage of the sorghum-sugar industry in Kansas. But other sections of the country show results quite as promising of ultimate and profitable success. H. A. Hughes reports most encouragingly of the experiments of the Hughes Sugar-House Company, of Cape May County, New Jersey. He presents the following results, namely:

The yields of the farmers' crops varied widely, the maximum being 1,970 pounds of raw sugar and 120 gallons of molasses per acre. This was made from 17 tons and 675 pounds of field cane. The term "field cane" means neither stripped nor topped. The minimum was 540 pounds of sugar and 60 gallons of molasses. All the seed used by the farmers was the same. The variations in yield were caused by the difference in cultivation. Other yields were as follows per acre:

Products.	First.	Second.	Third.	Fourth.
Sugar.....pounds...	1,970	1,560	1,444	1,254
Molasses.....gallons...	120	120	80	116

The company grew this cane on shares, giving the farmers one-half the products, namely, sugar, molasses, and seed. The basis of settlement was for raw sugar 4 cents per pound and molasses at 25 cents per gallon. Consequently the four best acres yielded—reduced to a cash basis—as follows:

	Quantity.	Amount.	Total.
Ephraim Hildrith:
Sugar, at 4 cents.....pounds...	1,970	$78.80	$108.80
Molasses, at 25 cents.....gallons...	120	30.00
Joseph Richardson:
Sugar, at 4 cents.....pounds...	1,560	62.40	92.40
Molasses, at 25 cents.....gallons...	120	30.00
William Hollingshead:
Sugar, at 4 cents.....pounds...	1,444	57.76	77.76
Molasses, at 25 cents.....gallons...	80	20.00
John Brown:
Sugar, at 4 cents.....pounds...	1,254	50.16	79.16
Molasses, at 25 cents.....gallons...	116	29.00

This does not include the seed which has not been thrashed.

These extracts represent the progress that has been made in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum-cane. But the entire case does not yet appear. The American skill and ingenuity, accorded pleasant mention in the President's message, have been resolutely exercised in inventing the processes which have evolved the results presented to us in the bulletin from which I have quoted, and these processes are found to be quite as effective in the manufacture of sugar from the sugar-cane as they are in its production from sorghum. This is shown by the report of E. C. Barthelemy relative to the application of the processes to the manufacture of sugar from sugar-cane in Louisiana. I here present the condensed summing up of the case as found in that report, namely:

I do not think, therefore, that it is extravagant to believe that with the best culture and most economical methods of manufacture the yield per ton of cane in Louisiana may be brought up to 200 pounds. The introduction of diffusion means almost a complete rehabilitation of the average sugar-house. It would be unreasonable to expect that planters will have the money and the desire to undertake such a radical change, or at least to make it rapidly.

But it seems to me that the gradual introduction of diffusion, with its concomitant machinery, will work a great change in the sugar industry of the South, bringing success and prosperity where for years a hard struggle for existence has been going on.

The final result, I sincerely hope, will bring into cultivation the extensive areas of rich sugar lands now lying idle and increase the production of the State of Louisiana to 500,000 tons annually.

* * * * * * *

Finally, I will say that no one recognizes more fully than myself the many imperfections noticed during the progress of the experiments in the machinery and methods employed. I have endeavored not to conceal these, believing that in pointing them out a service is rendered the public only less valuable than that secured by complete success.

Mr. President, these facts give most hopeful promise of the ultimate success of the sugar industry of the United States. If it shall receive that proper encouragement at the hands of the Government that its importance to the country will justify, I doubt if more than ten years will have passed by when our farmers and planters, from their crops of sugar-cane, sorghum, amber, imphee, and other canes, and from their sugar-beets, will have changed the direction of the current of our sugar and molasses. Now that current pours in upon us from foreign countries a vast volume of these articles which we ought to produce for ourselves. Last year 2,781,158,645 pounds of sugar and 37,419,424 gallons of molasses came to us from abroad. This can be stopped by a proper system of encouragement to home production, and save to our people the expenditure of nearly $100,000,000 per annum which now goes to the maintenance of the industry in other countries; and while this would benefit all of our people in a general sense, it would be a definite and effective advantage to those who live upon and cultivate the farms and plantations of our common country; for to them would be assured a direct and profitable participation in what would speedily become one of the most considerable industries of the nation. But, Mr. President, let us not forget the sturdy character of the appeals that are made to the farmers to join the free-trade ranks in a common assault on the protective policy, which has carried our country so far into the front rank of manufacturing nations. The President, in his message, joined his appeal to the many others that have been addressed to the farmers in this respect. He would have them believe that to the price of everything they buy is added the full duty imposed by the tariff on the various articles of purchase. He appealed to them in these words:

The farmer and the agriculturist, who manufacture nothing, but who pay the increased price which the tariff imposes upon every agricultural implement, upon all he wears, and upon all he uses and owns, except the increase of his flocks and herds and such things as his husbandry produces from the soil, is invited to aid in maintaining the present situation; and he is told that a high duty on imported wool is necessary for the benefit of those who have sheep to shear, in order that the price of their wool may be increased. They of course are not reminded that the farmer who has no sheep is by this scheme obliged, in his purchases of clothing and woolen goods, to pay a tribute to his fellow farmer as well as to the manufacturer and merchant; nor is any mention made of the fact that the sheep-owners themselves and their households must wear clothing and use other articles manufactured from the wool they sell at tariff prices, and thus as consumers must return their share of this increased price to the tradesman.

This is the old free-trade story. The President has got it committed perfectly, and he tells it to us and to the country with all the seeming assurance of believing it to be true; and he proceeds to discuss it in that solemn manner always assumed by persons who do not fully comprehend the subjects of which they treat. It would seem that he has fully made up his mind that the farmer pays the increased price which the tariff imposes on every article that he owns, uses, and wears. But it does not seem to occur to him that if this be true it might be some relief to the farmers to have the products of their farms granted some of the effective benefits which he insists come from the imposition of tariff duties extended to them by giving our protective policy more of an agricultural direction in its tendencies to increase prices. If the tariff increases the price of the manufactured article, why may it not do the same for the products of the farm? But this does not seem to be in the line of Executive thought, for the President says that—

The radical reduction of the duties imposed upon raw material used in manufactures, or its free importation, is of course an important factor in any effort to reduce the price of these necessaries. It would not only relieve them from the increased cost caused by the tariff on such material, but the manufactured product being thus cheapened that part of the tariff now laid upon such product as a compensation to our manufacturers for the present price of raw material could be accordingly modified. Such reduction or free importation would serve largely to reduce the revenue. It is not apparent how such a change can have any injurious effect upon our manufacturers.

But, Mr. President, what about the farmers? They are not manufacturers; they are producers of raw material. Everything grown upon the farm is, in the true commercial sense, raw material. Would it not be well for the President and his supporters to give some thought to this feature of the case? If the farmers are now oppressed by operation of the tariff, how are they to get relief through the plan suggested by the President, and formulated by his supporters, in a revenue bill for the consideration of Congress? While he and they are appealing to the prejudices of the farmers would it not be well for them to preserve some little remnant of consistency in their mode of procedure? But this is a consideration of prudent caution, which they seem to have wholly neglected. The President pleads in behalf of the manufacturers that if they only can get raw material free of duty they can stand a reduction of import duties and still maintain their profits, and that at the same time this plan of operation "would serve beside to largely reduce the revenue." He does not want to interfere with the profits of the manufacturers; but he does want to reduce the revenue. This can not be done without casting the burden on some other industry and the persons engaged therein. Where does he place it? On the producers of raw material. Can he name any article that is produced on the farm that is not raw material? Can he find anything in all of the long lists of things produced in this country, in respect of which labor represents so large a percentage of the gross cost of production, as in raw material? Every well-informed person knows that he can not. What conclusion does this enforce? Why, that the President's plan of tariff modification is to unload its resulting burdens from the manufacturing industries and place them on the farms and labor of the country. A policy more hostile to agriculture and labor has never been proposed to Congress than the one contained in the President's message.

Mr. President, am I mistaken in respect of the doctrines contained in the message now under consideration? I am sure that I do not mean to misconstrue the language of the document. Taken altogether it is quite bad enough in its un-American tendencies, and calls for none of the condemnatory aids of misconstruction. That I have resorted to none of these in the comments applied to it by me can be made indisputably apparent by further quotations from the message itself. Let this declaration be tested by the following extract from the message, namely:

I think it may be fairly assumed that a large proportion of the sheep owned by the farmers throughout the country are found in small flocks numbering from twenty-five to fifty. The duty on the grade of imported wool which these sheep yield is 10 cents each pound if of the value of 30 cents or less, and 12 cents if of the value of more than 30 cents. If the liberal estimate of 6 pounds be allowed for each fleece, the duty thereon would be 60 or 72 cents, and this may be taken as the utmost enhancement of its price to the farmer by reason of this duty. Eighteen dollars would thus represent the increased price of the wool from twenty-five sheep, and $36 that from the wool of fifty sheep; and at present values this addition would amount to about one-third of its price. If upon its sale the farmer receives this or a less tariff profit, the wool leaves his hands charged with precisely that sum, which in all its changes will adhere to it until it reaches the consumer. When manufactured into cloth and other goods and material for use, its cost is not only increased to the extent of the farmer's tariff profit, but a further sum has been added for the benefit of the manufacturer under the operation of other tariff laws.

What is this but a paraphrase of the extracts from the message which I have been commenting on? What is it but another way of stating the proposition contained in one of the former extracts, that, in order to reduce the revenue by a modification of the duties on manufactured articles, without interfering with the profits of the manufacturers, the producers of raw material must consent to have their products placed on the free-list? If the farmer wants to purchase woolen goods at cheaper prices he must consent to a repeal of the duty on wool in order that there may be a corresponding reduction on said goods. Why? Because this will preserve the profit of the manufacturer and at the same time enable him to reduce the price of his goods. But who pays the cost of this transaction? The farmer, of course. How? By selling his wool at a lower price. Why is this necessary? For the reason that a repeal of the duty on wool puts our farmers in competition with the products of foreign countries, depresses the price, and suppresses the industry in this country. How this result comes about, and what is the character of the effects induced, by modifications of the tariff on wool, is very well told in the address from which I have already quoted, and from it I give the following extract, namely:

The wool-growers have especial reasons at this time to appeal to their brother farmers for support. At a time when their industry is depressed as it hardly ever has been before by foreign competition, permitted by a reduction of duties in 1883, by Treasury rulings since, and by systematic frauds in foreign ports, the President proposes in his annual message the repeal of all duties on wool. In the two years before the change of duty, and in the past two years, the imports for consumption were as follows:

Year.	Quantities.	Duties.	Year.	Quantities.	Duties.
	Pounds.	Cents.		Pounds.	Cents.
1881	67,416,967	7.20	1886	107,910,549	4.75
1882	63,016,769	6.11	1887	114,404,174	5.16
Average	65,216,868	6.65	Average	111,157,361	4.95

Under efficient protection the production of wool rose from 60,000,000 pounds in 1860 to 308,000,000 pounds in 1884, the year after the change of duty. It has since declined to 285,000,000 pounds in 1888, and according to estimates of the Agricultural Bureau to 265,000,000 pounds in 1887. Meanwhile the stocks of domestic wool unsold at the close of 1887 are greatly increased; 31,974,000 pounds are on hand, an increase of 6,620,157 pounds, at Boston alone. To the mischief done by reduced duties there is added, first, the great fraudulent importation of Donskoi and other washed wool, under pretense that it is unwashed, a systematic fraud by which the United States consul at Odessa reports to the State Department that the Government has been defrauded for years, and of more than $15,000,000 in duties. Each pound of foreign wool thus fraudulently imported, already scoured and shrunken, takes the place of two to four pounds of American wool in natural condition.

How very different is this picture of the wool-growers and their interests from that drawn by the President in the extract last quoted from his message. Place his picture in whatever light you may, and none of the strong lines of the real subject and its true conditions appear. Who could infer from what he presents that the wool product of the United States had during any year amounted to 308,000,000 pounds, and that a reduction of the tariff duty could, in three years time, cause it to fall off 43,000,000 pounds? Or what is there in it to suggest that, owing to tariff tinkering, the importation of foreign wool had increased from 63,016,769 pounds in 1882, to 114,404,174 pounds in 1887? Here appears an increase in the quantity of foreign wool imported of 50,387,405 pounds; but this shade does not appear in the President's picture. Looking upon his subject as he presents it, one can but be impressed with the thought that the President is not a skillful economic artist. His conception is not bold. His hand is not cunning. He was treating a great subject; but his presentation of it on the canvas of his message was cold, dull, and flat. It is all foreground, with here and there a farmer with a little flock of sheep, "numbering from twenty-five to fifty." He did not comprehend those forceful lines of industrial and commercial perspective which belong to the subject he ventured to treat.

His vision was too contracted for the long-reaching vistas of the subject. Those who can follow the lines of these vistas as they stretch over the great expanse our country, and back into the years of the past, see aggregations of the President's little flocks of sheep very suggestive to those who have to formulate the economic legislation which should protect and promote the interests of all the industrial occupations of our people. Looking down the vista that stretches back to 1860, we see an aggregation of 22,471,275 sheep belonging to the farmers of the United States; the vista of 1870 increases this number to 28,477,951; that of 1880 to 35,192,074. These effects are all absent from the picture painted by the President. At no point in it can we see more than a few flocks of sheep, numbering from twenty-five to fifty; and the use to which he assigns them is to sacrifice the interest which the small holder has in the protection which the tariff on wool extends to him, in order to enable the manufacturer of woolen goods to sell his product at a little less price, and still maintain his present rate of profit.

Mr. President, the tendencies of the present time are too much in the direction of overlooking or neglecting the small factors which make up the magnificent aggregates of economic and industrial results in this country, and there is no interest known to the affairs of our people in respect of which this fact so universally obtains as that which is embraced in the agricultural industry. Had the President attempted to treat of the cattle-growing industry he doubtless would have said that "a large proportion of the cattle owned by the farmers throughout the country are found in small herds of from five to fifty," and the statement would be true; for while there are many herds numbering thousands, just as there are of flocks of sheep, still the factors which make up the large aggregate in greater part are represented by the small herds on the farms. Little thought is given to them; but in the grand national "round up" presented in the census of 1880 we brought the herds, both great and small, together and counted them. Then we found ourselves in possession of some splendid aggregates. We ascertained that we had of oxen, 993,841; of milch-cows, 12,443,120; of other cattle, 22,488,550, giving us a grand total of 35,925,519 head; and the milch-cows had, in the year represented, supplied us with 777,250,287 pounds of butter and 27,272,489 pounds of cheese; and the results of that census gave us interesting facts relative to what the small holdings of the individual farmers amount to when consolidated into grand totals.

In the field of live-stock, other than sheep and cattle, we found that our horses numbered 10,357,488; mules and asses, 1,812,808; swine, 47,681,700. But these were all held, like the cattle and the sheep, in small numbers by individual farmers, scattered all over our country. If the President had attempted to paint a picture from this group of facts, doubtless it would have been a fitting companion-piece to the one in which he presented the wool-growers and the wool industry of the country. Each individual factor would have been too insignificant to arrest the attention of the Executive mind, or to suggest to it the propriety of submitting to the consideration of Congress some proper and just recommendations for economic and protective legislation in respect of the general subject in which they are embraced.

Mr. President, let us consider some of the other features of American agriculture as presented by our last national census. It is shown that our farmers produced in the year represented therein 1,754,861,535 bushels of corn, 459,479,505 bushels of wheat, 407,858,999 bushels of oats, 44,113,495 bushels of barley, 19,113,495 bushels of rye, 11,817,327 bushels of buckwheat, 35,205,712 tons of hay, 26,546,378 pounds of hops, 110,131,373 pounds of rice, 169,458,539 bushels of potatoes, and 5,737,257 bales of cotton. None of these articles are sufficiently protected against the competition of foreign producers. These are all, in the proper commercial sense, raw materials, and in respect of which, as I have already remarked, labor constitutes the greater percentage of the cost of production. Why should any of these articles be imported? All of them can be produced in this country in quantities beyond the home demand; but, notwithstanding this fact, we imported them to the extent of about $15,000,000 in 1887. Of other products of our farms and plantations, exclusive of sugar, molasses, and tobacco, and in unmanufactured condition, we imported during said year over $50,000,000, making an aggregate of about $65,000,000. But we find no discussion of this feature of our industrial case in the President's message.

This is one of the hard facts of the farmer's side of the revenue case most "severely let alone" by the President and his supporters. Their plea to the farmer is, that at best he is only a "little fellow;" and if he will only be content to be stripped of the protection he now gets from the tariff he may be able to purchase some articles at a slightly reduced price and at the same time contribute to the maintenance of the present profit of the manufacturer, whatever that may be. And so we find no proposition from the President and his supporters to increase tariff protection to the farmer. What little he has must not be increased, but a part of what he now has must be taken from him. The foreign growers of wool want a free market in the United States for their product, and it is proposed to give it to them. Wool must go on the free-list; and the President and his supporters, utterly oblivious to the great aggregate of the interest involved, dodge the true issue and try to hide the un-American character of the scheme behind little flocks of sheep, "numbering from twenty-five to fifty." And this is all for the benefit of the farmers!

The farmers of the Western States have given considerable attention to the production of flax. Their annual product of seed amounts to about 12,000,000 bushels. This result has been induced by the tariff duty on the flaxseed. This protection against the cheaply raised seed of foreign countries, mainly Russia and British India, has assured to the Western farmers a fairly remunerative price for the product and has induced the erection of a large number of oil-mills in the Mississippi Valley; and in this particular industry we have a marked example of the advantages which follow the establishment of manufacturing plants in proximity with the production of the raw material. Before these mills were established the price of flaxseed-oil ranged from about 80 cents to $1 per gallon. The present price ranges from about 36 cents to 55 cents per gallon, and the farmers have the additional advantage of a considerable supply of the oil-meal at a reasonable price for feed for their stock. But while the duty on the seed has been sufficient to induce these results, the case is far from being satisfactory in some of its aspects. This is owing to the fact that the duties placed on many of the articles manufactured in whole or in part from the flax fiber have not been sufficient to induce the establishment of plants for their manufacture. Hence the foreign manufacturers of such articles have to a great extent control of the American market. This is a serious injury to the Western farmers who have turned their attention to the growing of flax.

They have no sufficient market for the flax-straw produced on their farms; and it is estimated that about 1,000,000 tons per annum of the straw goes to waste or is burned. It is estimated that this great waste could be converted into a gain of many millions of dollars by the presence of manufacturing plants to use the flax fiber. It is claimed that the amount of straw which now goes to waste annually could, by due preparation, be converted into an actual value of more than $20,000,000, and this would be a great help to the Western farmers. This is a problem in the economics of agriculture which can not be solved to the satisfaction of the farmers, who bear the burden of the loss, by abolishing or reducing the tariff duties on flaxseed, fiber and the products manufactured therefrom; but this is just what the President's message and the efforts of his supporters suggest shall be done. Far better would it be for the farmers to have the tariff so amended in respect of flax and the manufactures therefrom, that the waste to which they are now subjected could be converted into the millions of money of which it now deprives them. Of course I do not mean to say that all of the saving into which this waste could be converted by a proper adjustment of tariff duties would go into the pockets of the farmers, but they would get a great share of it, and the balance would pay the wages of thousands of workingmen employed in the preparation of the flax-straw into a valuable article of commerce ready for the machinery of the manufacturers. This would increase the home market for the other products of the farms, and thus give still further resultant advantage to the farmers; but no such door to a proper place in the tariff is opened to the farmers by the President's message.

His policy would eject them from their present lodgment in the tariff. His policy would not only deprive them in considerable degree of their present inadequate protection, but would also impose on them more than a fair proportion of the contribution necessary to be made to protect other industries from loss of profit. Surely the farmers of the United States will hesitate, reflect, and finally refuse to enter this Presidential trap.

Mr. President, must it not seem strange to the farmers of this country that we should be importing every year large quantities of beans, pease, potatoes, cabbage, eggs, hay, and other articles of food for man and beast? But this we do in spite of the fact we possess a surplus of these articles after supplying all demands for home consumption. The present tariff allows plants, trees, shrubs, vines of all kinds, seeds of all kinds, and eggs to be imported free of duty. Can not our farmers, nursery-men, and seedsmen supply all of these articles that we need? Of course they can. But do they do it? Why, from Canada alone there was sent into the United States of these articles in the year 1885 $1,831,000 worth; in 1886, $1,728,000; in 1887, $1,827,000; making an aggregate for the three years of $5,386,000.

And this was done while Canada was collecting customs duties on like articles sent into that country from the United States, notwithstanding she had agreed by the statute of May 15, 1879, that she would admit such products imported from this country on the same terms that we should admit those sent by her to us. And thus we see that it is not only the rights of American fishermen that Canada has been disregarding, but also those of our farmers, nursery-men, and seedsmen. And now the President and his supporters propose to enlarge our agricultural free-list, and thus allow Canada, as well as all other countries, to reap still greater advantages at the expense of our farmers. This is both unwise and unjust; and our farmers ought to resist it and demand that all articles produced by them be taken from the free-list and be subjected to reasonable or prohibitory duties. This is the true policy for the farmers to insist upon. It is the road which self-preservation has marked out for them in the economic march of the country. The home market is the best in the world for the American farmer. He should have his full share of protection in it; but even this is not enough. It should be enlarged, and he should help to accomplish this desirable result. He can do this by giving his earnest and effective support to the protective policy that has accomplished so much in the field of American industry.

We need greater diversity in our manufacturing industry, more widespread distribution of our manufacturing plants, more perfect contact of agriculture and manufactures, a more equal diffusion of the advantages that have been realized and are yet to come from our economic laws. The effort of all should be to build up rather than to tear down. This we have been doing for many years, not perfectly, but reasonably well. And as one grand result we now have the best paid, the best housed, the best clothed, the best fed population on the face of the earth. All this we have in possession, and if we are wise we will retain it.

Mr. President, we are still confronted with our annual surplus revenue of about $60,000,000. Is there no way by which we can get rid of it without disturbing our true industrial conditions? It seems to me that there is a way which is both short and clear. We have one public tax the gross yield per annum of which more than equals the reduction of revenue we are called on to make. The tax on intoxicating liquors is the one to which I refer. This is where I would make the reduction. I would not do this as a favor to those persons who are engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, but for the public defense; for it seems to me that the true interests of our people demand that we shall so adjust our revenue system as to prevent the tax on intoxicating liquors becoming a fixed and necessary part of it. For the last fiscal year there was collected from spirits $65,829,321.71; from fermented liquors $21,922,187.49, making a total collection under the internal-revenue law on the several kinds of liquors and the traffic therein of $87,751,509.20. The total revenue collected for that year from customs duties, internal revenue, and all other sources was $371,403,277.66. Thus it appears that nearly one-fourth of our gross revenue was derived from the internal-revenue tax on intoxicating liquors.

If we take from this gross amount the suggested reduction of $60,000,000 in our revenue, then the tax derived from intoxicating liquors, if not interfered with, will amount to considerably more than one-fourth of the whole. Would it be wise to put our revenue in this condition? Our surplus would be gone, and we will be more likely to find occasion for increase in the future than for further reduction. But if the condition should remain stationary is it best to establish it? Those who manufacture and deal in intoxicating liquors all seem to favor the preservation of this tax. Why is this so? Persons do not often insist on the imposition of taxes on their business or property. The rule is quite to the contrary, and the removal of a tax is hailed with great satisfaction. Why should this case be so different from all others? Is it not because of the hope these persons have that the reduction of revenue in other directions would result in so firmly embedding the business of making and selling intoxicating liquors in our revenue system that it could never be disturbed? This is the position it occupies in the revenue system of Great Britain, and who ever hears of a proposition on the part of that government to reduce the taxes on intoxicating liquors? Every other business and interest in the kingdom has been, unconsciously it may be, made into an obstructive force to any reduction of the taxes on intoxicating liquors.

The proportion of revenue which Great Britain derives from intoxicating liquors amounts to something more than one-fourth of the gross revenue of the kingdom, and it has come to be regarded as a fixed and permanent part of the system. A chancellor of the exchequer would as soon think of interfering with the Crown itself as with the liquor taxes. Nor has this economic condition been without its effect on the purposes and habits of that people. The purposes all tend to maintain the traffic and the tax, and steadily but surely the habit of use has grown and the volume of consumption increased. A knowledge of these facts, doubtless, has induced the manufacturers of, and dealers in, intoxicating liquors in this country to take the stand they have of opposition to any interference with the internal-revenue taxes imposed on them. This fact of itself ought to arrest our attention and enforce most patient and thorough consideration of the subject. We are brought face to face with the most malign foe of organized human society. It is the one and only thing with which local communities, States, and the nation have to contend, that subordinates every other interest to the promotion of its own ends. It has no religion, no morals, no politics, except such as it can debase to its own purposes. It has nothing in common with any of those elements and conditions that are essential to the prosperity and happiness of a people. Shall we give to it the enduring support by making it a necessary presence in our revenue system? This question is upon us now. We can not avoid it if we would.

In our consideration of this question we can afford for a time to omit the sentimentalities which crowd upon the mind at every mention of it. As a question affecting our economies and politics it is bad enough. It costs our people nearly $900,000,000 per year. This fact alone is a great economic disturber, for this vast expenditure is never accompanied by any counteracting good. It involves those habits of wastefulness which prevent the acquisition of homes and comforts by tens of thousands of our people who need both, and who could have them but for this enemy of correct habits and proper economies. It is the uncompromising enemy of the best type of manhood and citizenship. Whatever of good can be said of it, if such thing there be, can be offset by a multitude of evils. It has no conscience to stay its movements, no matter what calamity they portend.

But it is not worse in this respect than it is in politics. It is a forceful presence in this Republic; but it has no politics except its own, and no political conscience to restrain its action. No matter what of good may be moving in the political field, this malign presence never sees anything but its own purposes. It intermeddles, simply for its own purposes, in primaries and elections, and cares not what general political result may follow, provided it does not interfere with its insistence upon being let alone. Nor is it merely in political primaries and elections that it obtrudes itself. It is the active enemy of all laws that put restraints upon it. In one way and another it invades the magistrates' offices, the grand-jury rooms, the witness-stand, and sows the seeds of official disregard of duty, of perjury and subornation thereof. So constant are these practices, that the resulting demoralization too often obstructs the proper administration of justice, and unsettles the moral convictions of many persons connected therewith. A multitude of other hateful features stamped upon this enemy of economy, of politics, of individuals, of society might be mentioned as reasons why we should begin to tear down the revenue pillar which is now one of its most reliable supports; but this is not necessary, so thoroughly is the hatefulness of the thing understood by all.

Mr. President, I may not have my way of treating this subject approved by others. A disappointment of this kind will not be a new experience to me. Be this as it may, I shall deeply regret the passage of any bill by this body looking to a reduction of the revenue which shall not make a pronounced start towards the ultimate elimination of the liquor tax from our laws. It does not seem to me that I can properly discharge my public duty here in this regard except by insisting that the tax upon the manufacture of and traffic in intoxicating liquors shall not be permanently embedded in our revenue system. Let us take it out to the utmost dollar that we feel can be spared from our annual revenue. Let our revenue come from those sources that will promote our proper industries and maintain the wages of our working people. If there must be more protection in order to effect this result, let it be extended. There is abundant opportunity in our industrial field for us to practice this better policy. Let us encourage right and desirable industries, and so reform our revenue and transportation laws as will scatter manufacturing plants all over this country. This will promote the general welfare. But whatever we may or may not do, let us be sure that the great aggregate of revenue we get each year from the various taxes on intoxicating liquors shall not be made a permanent feature of the policy of this country. Let us not so intrench this great worker of evil in the necessities of our revenue system as to enable it to successfully resist the efforts now active in all parts of the country for its ultimate extinction. Let us give the moral forces of the country some chance of success in their conflict with this tireless promoter of evil.

REPRINT OF SENATE RULES.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to have the following order considered at this time:

Ordered, That the rules of the Senate now in force be reprinted for the use of the Senate.

I will state that it is impossible to get the little pamphlet copies of the rules for the use of Senators; they are very scarce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts ask for the present consideration of the order?

Mr. HARRIS. I shall ask for its present consideration if the Senator who offered it does not. The Senator from Massachusetts wishes to have it considered at present?

Mr. HOAR. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order?

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

Mr. HOAR. It is merely an order to reprint the pamphlet copy of the rules.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the question is on agreeing to the order.

The order was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had yesterday approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1564) for the relief of importers of animals for breeding purposes in certain cases; and

An act (S. 1663) authorizing the Little Rock and Alexandria Railway Company to build certain bridges in the State of Arkansas.

PURCHASE OF BONDS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5034) to provide for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to lay the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] on the table.

Mr. STEWART. With the consent of the Senate I withdraw the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn, and the question recurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to state that considering, as I must, the very pronounced vote of yesterday in the Senate upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], and especially the expressions of opinion then made touching the coinage of the bullion which it is here proposed to purchase, I suppose it to be entirely unnecessary, perhaps, to press my amendment, as no result would be reached in the direction I wish to have reached.

I will, however, simply explain the purport of the amendment. It proposes to limit the coinage to the amount fixed in the act of 1878. If there should be a surrender of national-bank currency largely in excess, we will say, of the $24,000,000 per year which is provided for and which is now coined, my amendment would limit the coinage to the $2,000,000 per month, or about $24,000,000 per year. But I think, in consideration of the very pronounced vote upon the question, that opposition perhaps had better cease, and therefore I ask the privilege of withdrawing my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be withdrawn, if there be no objection. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended upon the motion of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. HAWLEY. Were not the yeas and nays ordered?

Mr. HARRIS. Not on this question.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended, will be concurred in, if there be no objection. It is concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? on which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEWART. I withdraw the demand.

The bill was passed.

Mr. HARRIS. The title ought to be amended by adding "and for other purposes."

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of United States bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for other purposes."

Mr. BECK. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment to the bill and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BECK were appointed.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the special order.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2683) to provide for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry, and to facilitate the exportation of live-stock and their products, to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases among domestic animals, and for other purposes.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will be stated.

The first amendment was, in section 1, lines 17 and 18, to strike out the words "persons, at least one of whom shall be a practical stock-grower," and to insert the words "practical cattle-growers of known executive ability;" so as to read:

The board shall be composed of two practical cattle-growers of known executive ability and a competent veterinary surgeon, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 8, after the word "diseases," to insert the words "or conditions which may convey diseases;" so that it will read:

It shall be the duty of the said board to investigate and report upon the condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases or conditions which may convey diseases among them, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, line 14, after the word "diseases," to insert the words "and disease-conditions;" so as to read:

To examine and report upon the best means of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the best means for the suppression of the diseases and disease-conditions of live-stock, etc.

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator from Michigan to explain what is meant by "disease-conditions." The bill speaks of "the best means for the suppression of the diseases of live-stock," and the amendment is to insert "and disease-conditions." I should like to know the meaning of that phrase.

Mr. PALMER. I should say that that was intended to apply to cars that had been improperly disinfected, that had the litter and the bedding and the blankets of animals that had been diseased. I should think anything that would communicate the contagion or the disease would be a disease-condition. It seems to me that there is no other definition to be applied to it.

Mr. COKE. Would not that be fully signified under the term "suppression of the diseases?"

Mr. PALMER. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. COKE. The section reads:

To examine and report upon the best means of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the best means for the suppression of the diseases of live-stock.

Mr. PALMER. Where is the Senator reading?

Mr. COKE. At the bottom of page 2, section 2. The suggestion I make is that without the amendment the language used is sufficiently comprehensive.

Mr. PALMER. In other words, the Senator wants to leave out "conditions which may convey disease."

Mr. COKE. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. I think that is a very important amendment. If the conditions are sufficient to communicate disease, you might as well let the animals come in contact themselves.

Mr. COKE. But is not the "disease-condition" comprehended within the language used before "the best means for the suppression of the diseases of live-stock?"

Mr. PALMER. Possibly it is, but I suppose that it is better to have the phraseology of the bill so explicit that the man who runs may read, and that he can have no doubt as to what is intended.

The committee thought that was a very wise amendment; and while I generally defer to the judgment of the Senator from Texas, it seems to me that that can mean but one thing, and to amplify upon the statement which he says is sufficient can do no harm.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan something about this amendment. If I understood him correctly in answering the interrogatories propounded by the Senator from Texas, he said that "disease-conditions" referred to cars in which diseased stock had been transported. Am I right in understanding him in that way?

Mr. PALMER. That was the definition that I gave. It might be stated a good deal more minutely. The Senator from Mississippi I know understands what "disease-conditions" are as well as I do. It is any condition that will tend to the spread of the disease.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it a condition in the animal or in something else?

Mr. PALMER. I should think it was much broader than the mere condition of the animal itself. For instance, if I should say that I desired to remove the diseased-conditions from the gentleman's locality where he boarded, I should think that it meant to take care of the sewerage, to take care of the ventilation, to take care of the heating, and everything that could contribute to his welfare and to his physical well-being. That applies just as well in this bill in the treatment of animals. In the explanation of what are "disease-conditions" any condition that will tend to the inauguration of disease or its continuance is included.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I understand the Senator from Michigan to say that a movement to suppress "disease-conditions" here is a movement of a sanitary and hygienic character.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator speak a little more distinctly and a little louder?

Mr. GEORGE. The clause in which that first occurs is this——

Mr. PALMER. Give us the line.

Mr. GEORGE. Line 12, of section 2, speaking of the duty of the board—

to examine and report upon the best means of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the best means for the suppression of the diseases of live-stock,

I understand, then, that the meaning of that clause is that this board shall go into an investigation of the hygienic or sanitary conditions necessary for the health of live-stock.

Mr. PALMER. I think that that definition may be a little enlarged, but I think it is a fair interpretation.

Mr. GEORGE. And does not refer to any condition existing in the animal itself.

Mr. PALMER. I should say right there as the bill has been inspired and suggested by a disease which has brought great loss to this country and to Great Britain, as will appear later on, which I would have taken pains to explain if I had made a few preliminary remarks, still it may apply to everything that tends to the welfare of live-stock or domestic animals. Take it in the most enlarged sense. This commission is created for that purpose——

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question before he proceeds with his general statement?

Mr. PALMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. There is a radical change here, and it seems to me that that point ought to be settled before the details of the bill are perfected. Undoubtedly we are all in favor of a bill on this subject if the present law is not sufficient, but this bill provides for the appointment of a new board, a board in addition to or independent of or under the Agricultural Bureau. What is the necessity for a special board? Can not this bureau attend to the matter?

Mr. PALMER. I would have stated that if I had not been anticipated by the remarks of the Senator from Texas in the opening.

Mr. STEWART. Let us settle the preliminaries, and then we can go on and perfect the bill.

Mr. PALMER. It has been found, or it is claimed, by the cattlemen of the United States that the present organization of the Bureau of Animal Industry is not effective. I take their word for it. They claim that this vast industry, representing $2,400,000,000 of property, $113,000,000 of our foreign commerce, and an infinite number of millions of our domestic and interstate commerce, should not have for its representative alone the head of the Agricultural Department and a veterinary surgeon and two chiefs in different parts of the country. They claim that the interest is so vital and so vast that they should have three representative men, one a scientific man and the other two cattle producers of reputation; that they should be appointed by the President; that they should have the whole control of the Bureau of Animal Industry, although the bill was inspired in the first place by the disease of pleuro-pneumonia, which has inflicted a loss of $500,000,000 on Great Britain, and which is inflicting a direct loss of $6,000,000 upon the United States annually, besides the indirect loss in interstate commerce and quarantine.

They claim that the head of the Department of Agriculture has too many things upon his hands to properly have the supervision of this matter. They claim that the scientific man at the head of the Bureau of Animal Industry, a gentleman for whom I have the highest respect, can not give it that time and inspection that three men, two representative cattle-growers and one scientific man, could. They claim that the disease instead of being stamped out is now spreading, or at most is held merely at bay; that they are merely picking the fruit as it ripens; that around Baltimore there are fifteen thousand cattle to-day and only seven thousand of them tagged. They claim that Maryland is thoroughly honeycombed with this disease; that until two or three years ago it did not spread beyond the Alleghenies, but that now it has got beyond the Alleghenies; that it has appeared in Illinois and bids fair to get across the Mississippi; that now it can be controlled, but if it gets beyond the Mississippi, upon those ranges where thousands and millions of cattle roam, the same fate will befall our herds in the valleys of the Mississippi and the Missouri that befell the herds in South Africa and in Australia, 80 per cent. of them dying, whole herds being swept out.

The reason why the disease has not progressed more rapidly has been because animals have been segregated on the farms this side of the Mississippi; but as quick as it gets among the herds on the other side they can bid farewell to every steer, but I doubt whether they will wipe their weeping eyes.

Is that sufficient for the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. Not quite. I appreciate the force of all the remarks of the Senator from Michigan with regard to the extent of the difficulty and the necessity for a remedy; but my experience has been that too many heads in the management of any business is not a desirable thing. There can not be in this bureau, with this work added to it, near as much business as many other officers have to perform who are at the head of a Department; there can not be anything like the business the Treasury Department or other Departments have.

It seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan would only lead to a dual control, so that each would interfere with the other, and thus you would accomplish nothing; and it rather emphasizes the necessity of giving the Commissioner more power, and allowing him to select such scientific men as may be necessary to make the work effective.

That is what I fear in the scheme proposed. If you create a board independent of the bureau, with independent functions, you will have a conflict of jurisdiction; you will not have harmony of action, and you will not accomplish the purposes desired.

The Commissioner of Agriculture can act as the head and appoint and control his subordinates, and make them work as a unit on general principles much better than to have boards. Special boards in the Departments have generally clogged rather than facilitated operations of this kind.

It seems to me that the trouble about this new scheme is that it has too many heads, and will not be as effective as it would be to enlarge the powers of the Department, making the bill to apply to the Commissioner of Agriculture, and giving him such further assistance as may be necessary.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Senator from Nevada if he has read the bill?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, yes. I have not read all the amendments. I read it as first proposed.

Mr. PALMER. Section 2 provides:

That the said board shall, under the general direction and approval of the Commissioner of Agriculture, exercise the following powers and discharge the following duties:

You see there is the head; but the Commissioner will have three men who are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and who will act under his direction. It seems to me that that makes a head with a three-pronged hand that will accomplish a great deal more than a single head without representative men of known character appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Does that answer the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. I do not see any necessity for the creation of such a board. There may be a necessity for further officers; but if we have a board under his general direction I think he can prescribe rules and regulations. I believe in having an executive head of every Department and holding him responsible. Give more power to the Commissioner of Agriculture to make rules and regulations and enforce his directions, and that will be the most effective. I believe that with more power conferred upon the Commissioner, giving him power to select his subordinates, your bill will be more effective than if you do what is proposed here. That is my general idea.

Mr. PALMER. That plan, I will suggest, has been tried and failed. The Department of Agriculture have appointed a veterinary surgeon, and he has two chiefs in the field, but they have not been adequate to the emergency. As I said before, the disease is not being arrested, let alone being extirpated.

I call upon the Secretary to read a letter from the Live-Stock Sanitary Board of Maryland; and after that my coadjutor on the right [Mr. PADDOCK] thinks the report of the committee had better be read. We were precipitated into the debate without the proper preliminaries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

Mr. PALMER. I hope the Secretary will read it as distinctly as possible, for it may make some converts.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire what report that is.

Mr. PALMER. It is not the report of the committee.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought the Senator said he desired to have the report read. I supposed it was the report of the committee.

Mr. PALMER. It is a letter which is pertinent to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a letter of the Live-Stock Sanitary Board of Maryland, dated March 21, 1888. The reading will proceed.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the Chair to recommend to the Senator from Nevada that he give close attention to this letter.

Mr. STEWART. Did the Senator write it himself? If he did, it commands attention.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there any silver in the letter? [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

LIVE-STOCK SANITARY BOARD OF MARYLAND,
No. 28 St. Paul street, Baltimore, March 21, 1888.

DEAR DOCTOR: Your letter of inquiry into the work of exterminating pleuro-pneumonia in Maryland, dated 19th instant, came to hand during a session of our board, to whom I immediately referred it, and by whom I am instructed to reply as follows:

First. We are of opinion that owing to the fact that pleuro-pneumonia has existed to a very considerable extent in Maryland for the past thirty to forty years, the dairy stables in the suburbs of Baltimore City have become impregnated, and a majority of the cattle in this territory (from the habit of grazing on the unfenced commons and highways) are either "chronic cases" or have been exposed; and owing also to the difficulty of procuring a sufficient number of qualified veterinarians, and the difficulty of properly controlling the movement of cattle without temporarily putting a stop to all cattle traffic, it will take years instead of months (with the present equipment) to entirely free the State from the contagion.

Second. Our board has always been of the opinion that the work, in such State at least, should be under the supervision and control of a thoroughly practical business man; and that he should not be a veterinarian, if for no other reason than that the services of a competent veterinarian is of infinitely more value in the field-work.

Third. We do not find that "the diagnosis and opinions of veterinarians, in indicating the sick animals of a herd," to be any more satisfactory or reliable than the same work of the M. D.'s in their human practice, but, owing probably to the greater difficulty of making such diagnosis, from a lack of responses to questions as to symptons, etc., are probably less satisfactory. It has not "infrequently happened that a good many more animals were found on slaughter" to be diseased than were indicated by the veterinarians' ante mortem, and in some instances tuberculosis has been mistaken for pleuro-pneumonia.

Fourth. It is true that many diseased herds with animals far advanced with the disease have been found in districts already "tagged." The discovery of these cases is probably due to the "tagging." These animals were "tagged" by non-professionals, and would have been discovered earlier probably if we had had a proper number of skilled veterinarians. With about fifteen thousand "tagged" animals, most of which were tagged in November and December, only about one-half have yet received a first inspection for the want of a proper force.

Fifth. As to whether or not the "disease has kept pace with the work of extermination," our board are of opinion that with our present equipment we are about able to gather the fruit as it ripens. There is an apparent decrease at present, but it is well understood by all persons who have studied the disease that there is always an increase in number of cases from May to November. A more minute reply to the question would require an extended examination of our records, which we can not give at this time.

Sixth. We consider the "great lack" in the present system to be: First, the withdrawal of the most competent of the few available inspectors from field-work and putting them in charge of office-work which could be done as well by non-professionals; and, second, by holding animals in quarantine for long periods, awaiting owners' consent for slaughter, instead of using States' power of condemnation and appraisement, which could easily be accomplished, in this State at least, by arranging to indemnify the State, instead of the individual, for the appraised value.

Seventh. Your seventh question is answered as fully as we are able in our second reply.

Eighth. We inclose, as requested, such amendments of the bill (S. 2083) as will, we think, make the bill meet the requirements of our State laws; and all we have said above applies to the condition of affairs in our State alone.

Yours, etc.,

T. ALEX. SETH, Secretary.

Dr. AZEL AMES,
Of Committee of the Consolidated Cattle Growers' Association.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire from whom that communication is?

Mr. HISCOCK. Would it be in order for me to send to the desk and have read a communication from the New York State Agricultural Society?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York will pause. The Senator from South Carolina has asked the name of the writer of the letter. It will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. "T. Alexander Seth, secretary."

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make a remark in connection with that letter.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply want to get at what it is, first. Whom is it from?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the official title at the head of the letter.

The CHIEF CLERK:

Live-Stock Sanitary Board of Maryland, No. 28 St. Paul street, Baltimore. Commissioners: Alex. M. Fulford, T. Alex. Seth, John Brady. Signed, T. Alexander Seth, secretary.

Mr. STEWART. I wish simply to remark that that is cumulative evidence showing that it is necessary to have a single head and not a divided responsibility. It shows further and further the serious character of this business and the danger of dividing responsibility. I believe in holding the head of a Department responsible, giving him power enough to execute the duties intrusted to the Department. This is a very serious business. The letter shows plainly that the Department needs a larger force, and they need thorough executive management; but to have a commission in the Department to quarrel for the next year about jurisdiction, with so great an evil as this impending, is, I think, unwise at this time.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to have read in this connection a communication from the State Agricultural Society of New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the communication, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK STATE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Whereas it is of very great importance that any legislation that may be enacted by Congress for the suppression of contagious cattle diseases should be so framed as to accomplish its avowed purpose without serving any special interest or to the injury of others that are of greater importance; and

Whereas the bill now before the United States Senate, No. 2083, known as the Palmer bill, we believe to be framed in the interest of beef-growers and oleomargarine manufacturers, and to the injury of the great dairy interests of the country; and further,

Whereas it proposes to create a new and expensive organization for the work in view, which we believe can be better done by the present Department of Agriculture: Therefore,

Resolved, That we are opposed to the passage of the aforesaid bill, and respectfully petition Congress to substitute therefor such a measure as their wisdom may devise in accordance with the principles herein stated, and which will place the work in the charge of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Resolved, That this society condemns the unwarranted use of its name in favor of this bill, which it believes inimical to the great dairy interests of the nation, and being unwilling even to seem to favor such a law, it rebukes the National Consolidated Cattle Growers' Association for using the influence derived from its membership therein in favor of the passage of this law, and withdraws from membership in that association.

Resolved, That the secretary transmit copies of these resolutions to the Representatives and Senators in Congress from this State, to the Commissioner of Agriculture, to the President of the United States, and also to the Committee on Agriculture in Congress, and to each member of the New York Legislature.

I certify the above to be a true copy of resolutions this day passed unanimously at a meeting of the executive board of the New York State Agricultural Society, all but one member (Hugh Duffy, of Cortland) being present.

J. S. WOODWARD, Secretary.

ALBANY, N. Y., March 23, 1888.

Mr. PADDOCK. I call now for the reading of the report that accompanies the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that there is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. PALMER. There is a report.

Mr. PADDOCK. The report has been printed.

Mr. PALMER. And I think I can find one. I have one here.

Mr. REAGAN. The report is No. 596.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska has called for the reading of the report. The Secretary now has it.

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator from Michigan if this is a unanimous report.

Mr. PALMER. No, sir. I think there were five for and three undecided, and one very positively against the bill on constitutional grounds, not on economic grounds. We shall come to that point later, I will say to the Senator from Texas. That will be the last act of the drama, I imagine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PALMER March 16, 1888:

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (S. 945) to extirpate contagious pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, and rinderpest among cattle, etc., beg leave to report:

That they have carefully investigated the subject-matter of the bill (S. 945) referred to them, and after extended conference with those representing the vast interests at stake and due deliberation have prepared the amended bill herewith submitted (S. 2083).

Your committee have had before them the representatives of the consolidated cattle interests of the country, charged with the duty of urging upon the attention of Congress the necessity of relief for their great industry, which has $1,100,000,000 at stake; also leading stock growers, breeders, and agricultural editors from different parts of the country, together with the Commissioner of Agriculture and the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Most of them agreed that there is a great and immediate necessity for legislation on the part of Congress that will provide efficient and permanent authority, machinery, and means for the suppression and extirpation of diseases among domestic food animals.

These diseases, especially the exotic disease contagious pleuro-pneumonia, have not only already cost the country a direct loss, it is safe to say, of $50,000,000, but their interference with interstate commerce and the restrictions they have brought upon our export trade in live cattle have occasioned a loss of many millions more.

Tuberculosis among cattle and cholera among swine have become not less important dangers to our food supply and our export trade. Their extensive spread and the grave results they portend make them matters of the most serious concern.

As indicating the importance of every possible protection to the live-stock industry of this country, it may be stated that it is shown that our meat supply holds the second place in importance in the food staples of the country and stands next to cotton in our export list (is likely soon to stand first) while the live-stock and their products furnish two-fifths of the transportation business of the country.

Our herds are rapidly lessening in proportion to our increase of population from natural causes alone, as, e. g., the increased value of farm lands, the settling up of the public domain, the late unprofitableness of stock-raising, etc. Further decimation by disease can not be borne. We have now probably not more than 600 head of cattle to the 1,000 of population, as against 814 to the 1,000 in 1860.

It is significant, too, that Egypt, India, and Russia having measurably taken our wheat trade in the markets of western Europe, Russia our petroleum trade, and India (largely) our cotton trade, cattle, swine, and their products have become the principal export staples upon which we must rely to turn the balance of exchange in our favor.

Our export trade in live cattle and in hog products was a fast-growing and very remunerative line of traffic, as was also the foreign demand for our improved stock for breeding purposes, notably from China, Japan, and South America, until the presence of these diseases in this country caused foreign powers, partly in genuine alarm and partly as a pretext in favor of their own products, to place such embargoes and restrictions upon our exportation as to seriously cripple and, in some cases, practically destroy the business.

The exceedingly subtile and evasive character of some of these diseases, especially pleuro-pneumonia and swine plague, is such as to make the immediate destruction of all animals affected by or exposed thereto the only sure and safe method for their extirpation.

The evidence is ample that animals that have been affected with pleuro-pneumonia and are apparently recovered often have still encysted portions of the diseased lung, which under any hardship break down and relight the disease. If the animal has, meanwhile, being unsuspected, been conveyed to a new locality, it immediately becomes there a new center of disease.

The danger to the herds of the country, especially the great beef herds of the Western ranges, where no isolation and control are possible, is apparent, and the measures to protect them, in the interest of our food supply alone, from the decimation which a few years since overtook the herds of South Africa and Australia under the march of this disease, can not be too speedy or effective.

To restore our export trade in live-stock, swine products, and breeding animals, so highly important to us as a nation, it is necessary to speedily extinguish all possible pretexts for discrimination against these staples on the part of foreign governments.

There is no dissenting voice as to either the magnitude of the interests at stake, the gravity of the dangers which menace, the necessity for national legislation providing means and authority for extirpation, or as to the necessity for destruction of the diseased and exposed animals, to eradicate disease.

The agencies and powers best adapted for the accomplishment of the work have been the chief subjects of discussion and concern on the part of the committee.

The bill (S. 945) referred to them, proposing an independent commission of three, including the Commissioner of Agriculture ex officio, to be appointed by the President, and to exercise their functions when and as long only as he might deem requisite, was substantially the bill (S. 3025, second session Forty-ninth Congress), passed by the Senate at its last session, known as the "Miller bill," and has received very extensive indorsement by Legislatures, boards of agriculture, and agricultural and stock-growing organizations of all kinds, in all parts of the country.

It was especially urged by the great representative organization of the cattle industry, the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association of the United States.

Although carefully and intelligently drawn by able constitutional lawyers and practical stock-growers, and so strongly supported by the country, your committee feel that Senate bill 945 fails to recognize certain factors very desirable in such legislation; and with regard to these, while earnestly desirous of preserving all the features deemed essential by its friends and of securing to the country every possible protection, they believe a recast of the bill and a change in some of its features will best promote the end sought.

To this view the advocates of the original bill have given their cordial assent, and have transferred their entire support to the substitute herewith submitted by the committee.

Your committee hold primarily that all administration of affairs under authority of national legislation should, so far as practicable, be in and under the general control of established Executive Departments of the Government.

They believe, also, that the great and fundamental interests of agriculture and their representation in the executive branch of our Government should be steadfastly recognized. Therefore they hold that any authority and measures proposed by legislation upon matters so essentially within the domain of, and related to, agriculture as those sought for the protection of food animals should be (as far as practicable) within the general administration of the Department of Agriculture.

They have therefore thought it wise to provide that the agencies and powers desired by the country should reside within the general direction of this Department rather than in an independent commission.

At the same time they believe that, to promote the greatest possible efficiency, the existing organization of the present Bureau of Animal Industry should be discontinued, and that a new one, constituted as proposed in the bill submitted, should be created.

Upon this new bureau should devolve all the duties and powers appertaining to the present organization, with those other added powers, duties, and responsibilities prescribed in the bill. By this means the country secures all that it has enjoyed; the special necessities not now adequately met are provided for, an instrumentality which is demanded, comprising all possible elements of efficiency is created; an authority sufficiently ample to give general and even special oversight is obtained, and it is believed that economy will be greatly promoted.

Every element of advantage seems to be secured, while none of disadvantage, as compared with the present organization or of the independent commission plan suggested, present themselves.

Certain features of the bill, not previously existing in our legislation to these ends, and suggested by the practical experience of those who have dealt with these problems, have strongly commended themselves to your committee.

The Presidential appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is a guaranty of the fitness and representative character of the membership of the proposed board. The requirement that the President of the United States shall approve the rules and regulations of the board affords assurance that their legal status and general soundness will be secured, and will contribute greatly to the respect they will command in execution. At the same time it is a guaranty to the authorities and citizens of the several States, that though great powers are conferred by the bill, as essential to successful administration, they will be exercised only under such carefully framed rules and regulat ons as the practical wisdom of the board and the guarded approval of the President and his law officers shall determine.

The sections of the bill which provide for promulgation (by rule of the board approved by the President) of existing localities of disease, and the Presidential proclamation of the extinction of disease in State or nation (the latter to be made known abroad), will meet the cordial approval, the committee believe, of the stock-grower, the transportation companies, and State authorities who have felt their want.

The careful recognition of the inalienable rights of the citizen in his property, and of the autonomy of the States, while at the same time the powers vested in Congress by the Constitution "to regulate commerce between the States" are availed of, the committee believe, can not but command general approval.

No man's property is taken from him without his consent, and it is fairly paid for when he consents to its destruction. The national police powers for the protection of interstate commerce are invoked only to the extent requisite for general welfare, and exercised in co-operation when possible.

It is become so evident that in the case of such a disease as pleuro-pneumonia a single cow having the disease in any State (perhaps contracted before coming into the State, even before importation), and never intended to be removed from the State, can yet unperceived infect other animals that are likely to be removed across State lines, as at a State fair, or en route to such fair, or in coming into the State may so infect cars, boats, etc., used in interstate commerce, though never herself crossing State boundaries, that such an animal is, may be, often has been, both a direct and indirect factor in the interstate spread of the disease.

Moreover, this is now so fully recognized that the simple knowledge of the fact that this single cow, sick with the disease, exists in any State is held to indicate danger of all the attaching possibilities in the traffic with that State, and immediately the executive of every other cattle State issues a proclamation against and sets up exacting and ruinous quarantine restrictions upon all cattle coming from that State. Thus at once interstate commerce receives a very decided check, as damaging almost as disease itself.

There can be no doubt that such conditions are so related to interstate traffic as to be proper subject-matter for law under the constitutional provisions and powers for the regulation of traffic between the States.

Although holding that the powers given in the bill are soundly based on both the "regulation of interstate-commerce" clause of the Constitution and upon the precedent established by the Forty-ninth Congress in the grant of power to the Commissioner of Agriculture quoted, the committee freely admit the desirability of co-operation between State and Federal authorities in the work of suppression whenever practicable.

To that end the bill provides (sec. 3) that "whenever the governor of a State or Territory, or other (State) officer duly authorized by law thereto, shall signify * his * assent or readiness to co-operate," etc., "the board (bureau) shall proceed in co-operation" with such authorities, etc.

It need not be said that, except as duly authorized thereto by legislative enactment, the governor of a State could not so commit his State; hence, however desirable it may be that co-operation shall be had, it can not be except as provided for in State law. This at present exists in but five States. The bill extends the fullest possible recognition to these, as to all other States, as fast as they shall (as they doubtless rapidly will) enact laws thus empowering their executives. More Congress could not do without stultifying itself, and law, courtesy, and comity, as well as good judgment and desire for results, forbid its doing less.

The committee commend to the attention of the Senate the printed report of the evidence given at their hearings upon the bill referred to them.

They recommend that the amended bill, as submitted herewith (S. 2083), be passed.

Mr. COKE. I ask leave to submit a memorial to Congress from the Northwest Texas Cattle-Raisers' Association, adopted at Gainesville, March 14, in reference to this bill, to be read and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read.

The Chief Clerk read, as follows:

The following memorial to Congress was unanimously adopted at the regular meeting of the Northwest Texas Cattle-Raisers' Association at Gainesville

March 14, having previously received the indorsement of other important Texas associations:

MEMORIAL TO CONGRESS.

Whereas a bill is now pending before the Congress of the United States that has for its object the abolishment of the present Bureau of Animal Industry and the substitution of a board of three men; and

Whereas the bureau as at present constituted has rendered valuable service to the stock interests of the whole country in the matter of purging diseased centers and preventing the spread of bovine diseases of an infectious and contagious character; and

Whereas it is reasonable to suppose that after years of experience in the line of scientific investigation and practical work in the field, the forces already organized will do more effective work than a commission of new and inexperienced men; and

Whereas the existence of a scientific bureau at the national capital where all the diseases of our domestic animals may be investigated at the expense of the General Government, securing the full benefit of the information accessible through the channels of international reciprocity, is a necessity, in view of the fact that contagious diseases are common among the domestic animals of most of the nations with which the United States enjoys commercial intercourse; and

Whereas such a bureau should be under the control of scientific men, rather than temporary appointees, given place because of political influence; and

Whereas it is believed that some of the persons now engaged in the work of pushing the objectionable bill are actuated more by a desire to get control of the sanitary powers of the Government than by an honest conviction that the bill is best for the country; and

Whereas the above conclusion is a reasonable deduction, from the fact that the leading spirits engaged in the work of lobbying the bill through Congress are the same parties who, apparently for selfish purposes, secured the stoppage of the entire drive of Texas cattle on the trail near Camp Supply, in the Indian Territory, three years ago, on the pretext of disease, thereby inflicting serious loss upon cattle-owners in Texas, Colorado, and elsewhere; and

Whereas the introduction in Congress of the bill referred to, known as "amended Palmer bill," is a gross violation of pledges given, as will be seen by reading the following resolutions passed unanimously at the last annual meeting of the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association, held in Kansas City, Mo., last November.

"Resolved, That the legislative committee of the Consolidated Cattle-Growers' Association of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to labor for the passage of the bill known as the Miller-Carey bill, with the amendment that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be a member of the commission and ex-officio its chairman.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this convention are hereby tendered to Norman J. Colman, United States Commissioner of Agriculture, and Dr. D. E. Salmon, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, for the efficient work they have done in stamping out pleuro-pneumonia with the limited powers conferred upon them by existing legislation:" Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Northwestern Texas Cattle-Raisers' Association in annual meeting assembled this March 14, 1888, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, most earnestly appealed to refuse to pass the said Palmer bill, and instead thereof to pass a bill that will retain the present Bureau of Animal Industry in power, strengthening its hands by such widening of powers as may seem best, and giving it an appropriation of $500,000 with which to continue the work of stamping out disease in accordance with the methods at present being so successfully employed.

Resolved, further, That the thanks of all the cattle-owners of the country are due to the Hon. Norman J. Colman, Commissioner of Agriculture, and his subordinates, for the good work they have already accomplished and the promises of results desired by the country.

Resolved, That the secretary of this association send copies of these resolutions to members of Congress from Texas, and request them in the name of the association to use their utmost endeavors to protect the live-stock interests of Texas by securing legislation in Congress as above indicated.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, when this bill was first presented to the Senate, and the report on it was laid on our desks I read both with great care. Representing in part a people very largely interested in protecting the stock of the country against pleuro-pneumonia and kindred diseases, and having a good deal of difficulty in regard to the bill as presented, and desiring to know from the best authority what ought to be done, my colleague and myself, after conversation, wrote a letter to the Commissioner of Agriculture and received his reply, which I desire the Secretary to read, so that both may go upon the record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C., March 30, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Please find inclosed Senate bill No. 2083, with the report thereon, No. 596, laid before the Senate by the Senator from Michigan, Mr. PALMER, a few days ago, from the Committee on Agriculture. The proposed amendments, as you will observe, are inserted in italics. As pleuro-pneumonia is a disease in the extirpation of which the people of Kentucky are greatly interested, we desire you, after a careful examination, to advise us what you think about the bill. We have understood that the present law is working reasonably well, and we do not desire to make any experiments unless they are obviously beneficial. There are many radical changes of the existing law proposed in the bill we send you, especially in regard to the authority of a board of three persons to constitute a Bureau of Animal Industry in your Department who are, according to the amendment of the Senate committee, to be practical cattle-growers of known executive ability, with a veterinary surgeon, at salaries of $4,000 a year. We are afraid of divided authority, and unless there is some good reason why the change should be made, we do not feel disposed to favor the change without information. Some of the provisions of the bill stretch the constitutional authority of Congress very far; therefore we desire you, if you can consistently do so, to advise us how the present law is working, and whether the proposed changes would be beneficial or not, giving your reasons as far as you can for the views you entertain. We ask this, because we have not had the time nor the opportunity to make as thorough an investigation for ourselves as the importance of the subject requires, and as you are at the head of the Agricultural Department, we have no doubt your attention has been called to it and you have made a careful investigation for yourself. Your views, therefore, would be very useful to us, representing in part as large interests as Kentucky has in regard to the subject of pleuro-pneumonia, in determining what we ought to do.

Yours, truly,

J. B. BECK.
J. C. S. BLACKBURN.

Hon. NORMAN J. COLMAN,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1888.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 30th instant, asking of me my views as to Senate bill 2083, for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry in my department, and I herewith comply with your request.

First, as to the existing legislation which this bill proposes to be a substitute for, and the work done and being done by the present Bureau of Animal Industry, especially as regards the eradication of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, I have this to say:

The Bureau of Animal Industry was organized under act of Congress, May 29, 1884, and the object of its establishment was, primarily, for the investigation of the condition of domestic animals, their protection and use; for the investigation as to the causes of contagious and infectious diseases among them, and the discovery of means for the prevention and cure of the same, and the collecting of such information on these subjects as would be of value to the industrial interests of the country; secondarily, for the establishment of rules and regulations for the suppression and extirpation of such contagious diseases.

The governing principle of the present law, in so far as it relates to the eradication of disease, is that this work should be done under the authority of State statutes. The Bureau of Animal Industry places in each State, whenever outbreaks occur, a force of well-trained and experienced veterinarians and other employés to eradicate the disease in accordance with the legislation provided by the State.

At an early date it was decided by the Comptroller of the Treasury that this department was not authorized to expend money for the eradication of diseased and that its appropriation was confined to disinfection and quarantine measures necessary to prevent the spread of disease from one State to another. Accordingly the work of the bureau was restricted to this extent, and no general plan or method could be adopted which would provide for the eradication of disease. Up to April, 1887, the bureau supplied the various States, when requested, with veterinarians for investigating the alleged existence of pleuro-pneumonia, and provided for the expense of maintaining quarantine measures and of disinfecting premises, the State authorities paying the cost of killing and destroying the exposed animals. Up to this date the bureau stamped out in this way outbreaks of disease in the States of Missouri, Ohio, Kentucky, and Delaware. On March 3, 1887, Congress gave to the bureau a large appropriation and provided for its expenditure in the eradication of pleuro-pneumonia.

This appropriation enabled us to establish a general system, covering the investigation of the disease in all parts of the United States, and a systematic method applicable to every State for its eradication. The necessary rules and regulations were prepared by me under the law and certified to the governors of the various States and Territories. These rules, a copy of which I inclose you, marked A, have been accepted by the governors of twenty-seven States and seven Territories. The Legislatures of seven States have provided by legislation for co-operation between the United States and their respective live-stock commissions. These States are Michigan, Kentucky, Delaware, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and Tennessee. Six States have passed special statutes for co-operation, making the officers of the Bureau of Animal Industry State officers, and conferring upon them the power of investigation, quarantine, and condemnation of animals in their respective States. They are Virginia, Illinois, New York, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island. In addition, special agreements of co-operation have been made with the authorities of the States of New Jersey, Maryland, and Pennsylvania.

During the past year the bureau has stamped out a serious outbreak that existed in Cook County, in the State of Illinois. It has also stamped out outbreaks in the counties of Delaware and Washington, in the State of New York. It has eradicated the disease from the counties of Howard, Carroll, and Prince George's, in the State of Maryland, and has likewise suppressed small outbreak in Elizabeth City County, Virginia, and Kent County, Maryland, which had been introduced by the importation of diseased cattle from the city of Baltimore, Md. The disease of pleuro-pneumonia has thus been confined by the bureau to three large centers, namely, Jersey City and vicinity, in the State of New Jersey; New York and vicinity, in the State of New York; and Baltimore and vicinity, in the State of Maryland. The three States in which these cities are respectively located have laws which, if properly enforced, are sufficient for stamping out what remains of the disease in this country. By means of co-operation the bureau is now at work in all of these places with a well-trained force, endowed with full authority as State officers to carry out the provisions of the State law. The counties of Westchester and New York, and the counties comprising Long Island and Staten Island are held in quarantine by proclamation of the governor of the State of New York, and this quarantine is being rigidly enforced. Not an animal of the bovine species can be introduced into, or taken out of, these districts without first being inspected by a veterinary inspector of this bureau and a permit being obtained for its movement. In addition to its own police force the bureau has the help and assistance of the constabulary of the various counties, the police force of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, together with all the aid and assistance that the boards of health of the counties enumerated can give. There are held in quarantine in the counties of Westchester and New York about 75,000 head of cattle and about 100,000 on the two islands. Of this number 55,000 head have already been tagged by the bureau and their history obtained, and the tagging is now progressing at the rate of from 800 to 1,000 animals per day. Diseased herds as soon as found are at once appraised and slaughtered and the premises disinfected.

The same condition of affairs exists in the county of Hudson, in which is located Jersey City, where there is to be found about 20,000 head of cattle. Similar conditions exist in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, where there have been tagged and are now held in quarantine about 15,000 head of cattle.

Much criticism has been passed upon the want of co-operation between the Department and the State of Pennsylvania. It has been alleged that the disease exists in the city of Philadelphia to a large extent and that it is a menace to the cattle trade. This Department has not been able to find any pleuro-pneumonia in Pennsylvania unknown to the State authorities. In order, however, to ascertain the extent of its existence in Philadelphia and to set at rest the rumors as to its prevailing, and relieve the fears of the cattle trade, co-operation has been agreed upon between the governor of Pennsylvania and this Department, and the governor has issued a proclamation quarantining the city of Philadelphia, which goes into effect on the 10th day of April, and the Bureau of Animal Industry will commence its work of extirpating the disease, if any is found, on that day in the State of Pennsylvania. I am of the belief that pleuro-pneumonia is now under complete control, and that there is very little danger, if any, that animals can escape from these quarantined centers so as to spread the disease to other portions of the country. I am satisfied that no bill can be devised which could more speedily or more effectually stamp out pleuro-pneumonia by any other plan than the one now in operation. I believe that, the work having reached this stage, it would be impolitic and ill-advised to make any change in the instrumentality by which it is being done. The State officers of the several States in which the work is being carried on are in hearty accord with the Bureau of Animal Industry and perfectly satisfied with the manner in which the work is being accomplished. To therefore disestablish this bureau and place in its stead a new body of men, necessarily inexperienced, would be, in my judgment, a grave mistake and one that might bring serious disaster upon the cattle industry. It would also be to throw away the results obtained by the expenditure of perhaps $500,000 and start anew to accomplish the same end.

The work so far done by the Bureau of Animal Industry has been done in a
